These are phases of agriculture, and Nebraska is essentially an agricultural State. We used to call it the State without a mine. While we must amend this statement with the exception of potash production, agriculture still stands out as our great industry entitled to intelligent consideration at the hands of Congress. Nebraska will probably lead in surplus products which our troops and those of our allies most greatly need.

We hear much about standing by the President of the United States. In matters of legislation, in so far as he has the constitutional right to recommend it and thereafter veto or sign the deliverance of Congress, Members will support him when he is right and wise and refuse to do so when he is not. Who does more surrenders the prerogatives which his people intrusted to him. On the other hand, the President should not conform his recommendation nor give or withhold his approval except as he sees wisdom and right or the lack of them in completed legislation. That is the only way we can preserve our Government, and only as so preserved at home would it be worth while for our boys to be defending it abroad.

INDEPENDENCE OF CONGRESS.

The President under the Constitution is the Commander in Chief of our land and naval forces. As such, together with the officers under him and the soldiers in the trench or on the deck, he is entitled to the wise and wholesome support of Congress and the American people. He and they have the right to ask that the best clothing, food, medicine, equipment, and munitions be furnished. Congress has responded in full and heaping measure and will continue so to do. But Congress will probably remember that it is no part of the Army, is under no orders, and that it represents the civilian population and should take no commands from anyone. As a Congress, it has no commander in chief.

MY SUPPORT OF WAR MEASURES.

While strongly imbued with these constitutional principles, I have supported every complete war measure that has been presented to the House and endeavored, as a member of its leading committee, to demonstrate to the people of the United States and the world that after the war's declaration and after the constituted committees have written out and perfected as nearly as possible important measures, that we support them.

SOLDIER GRANDSONS OF GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC AND SONS OF SPANISH-AMERICAN VETERANS.

Americans in civil life, whether public or private, will support our armed forces by delivering, under proper enactment, all they have and all they may ever hope to have, all they are and all they ever hope to be, to strengthen our Army and Navy, from the Commander in Chief "over here" down to the gallant soldiery "over there." In so doing they will make no distinction as to rank except that which the law entails. We have a grand soldiery. Nearly a million "over here," more than a million "over there." Many of them are the superb grandsons of the members of the Grand Army of the Republic, that greatest fighting force ever organized during the nineteenth century. The fathers of some of these were in that noble humanitarian strife, the Spanish-American War, many of whose veterans are of the fighting force of the Republic. Sons of patriotic parents are they all, doing the soldier's duty under military law.

SOLDIERS—VOLUNTEER AND SELECTIVE.

The American soldier came into the service either as the volunteer act of the young patriot, who asked permission to battle for the Nation and its flag, or entered through the systematic selection of his Government, which saw in him the preparation and fighting qualities which could endure the march and gallantly battle for victory. They are both of that American mold for which civilization seemed to wait and call upon for defense in this the hour of her greatest peril.

MY OWN BOYS.

Pardon the personal reference. I have two sons in the service. I belong to many noble civic orders whose principles and ideals have done much for mankind. I have worn their emblems, but during this war I shall wear only that sacred service symbol on my breast. Perhaps a sympathetic people will not disapprove of the pride a parent may indulge in wearing such an emblem, for no insignia of rank, no other badge of honor granted by any power on earth can with it compare.

Distance and public service prevented my seeing either of these sons as they left the home of happiness and the place where they were born. Like millions of other young Americans they saw their country's need and responded to its call. With patriotic zeal and buoyant ambition they entrained for their cantonment and field. One is in the Field Artillery Service, which strives to overcome the inertia of earth and withstand the onrush of battling men. The other sought service in that new field which from creation's dawn was deemed the domain of the eagle, but which, through the genius of man, has become the battling ground of supermen.

VISIT TO CAMP AND FIELD.

I have visited and met their officers, types of chivalry, and their comrades, manly men from every part of the Republic.

I passed through their cities, built, as it were, in the night, where multiplied thousands work and drill, sleep and eat, read and pray, as men in civil life are wont to do. I saw them move in mighty marches on the campus—drill, steady, vibrant, virile movement—characterizing American manly motion. I saw in many cantonments their daily round of duty and recreation. I visited their hospitals where disease and suffering were, and found the skilled men of medicine and surgery there who had left their homes and practice to battle against disease, that our soldiers might better battle with men. Then, too, I saw the ministering angels of mercy there, who, upon occasion, would with deft hand apply the bandage, administer the soothing lotion, or cool the fevered brow. No longer will it be written as was of old of the "soldier of the legion lay dying in Algiers, there was a lack of woman's nursing and a lack of woman's tears." I broke bread with the officers at their mess and beheld the transformation of the student athlete into a fighting military leader. I dined with the privates and enjoyed their wholesome fare. I visited the Knights of Columbus establishment and attended divine service at the Young Men's Christian Association hut. It seemed to me that we were making not mere fighting demons of our sons, but clean, strong, manly fighting men. As I left I said, "This is America militant, and young American manhood at its best."

LET NO GUILTY MAN REMAIN.

Theft is criminal and should be punished; graft is worse and should be more severely dealt with, because the grafter betrays a trust as well as takes that which is not his. "Let no guilty man escape" is an old watchword. But the gravest crime now is neither of these. In this crisis of the great war, while the "battle of the ages" is on, the greatest American criminal is one who occupies an important position and who does not or can not discharge with high efficiency his duties. Disposition of such characters should be swift and summary. Here the watchword should be reversed. It should be, "Let no guilty man remain." [Applause.]

PEACE TERMS.

Much is said of peace terms. American terms of peace will not be acceptable to undefeated Germany. There must be a conclusive allied victory. The terms proposed by America, agreed to by the allies, approved by the conscience of mankind, and submitted to by Germany, will be the peace text of the world.

Our men, more than a million strong, will be thrown into the balance not only to turn a grim deadlock into a decisive victory but to determine the successful close of a world war and give character to the course of civilization. This being true, there should be no failure by delay, neglect, incompetency, or worse, to give them all the preparation and support which the loyal and generous Americans have lavishly provided and our soldiers and sailors so richly deserve.

BATTLE OF THE AGES.

It would be trite to say the battle now going on on this western front is the greatest of all time. That would give no suggestion of its magnitude. I have just reread an old book entitled "Creasy's Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World." Beginning with Marathon, Syracuse, Arbela, Metaurus, Victory of Arminius, Varnus Legions, Chalons, Tours, Hastings, Joan of Arc's at Orleans, Defeat of Spanish Armada, Blenheim, Pultowa, Saratoga, Valmy, Waterloo. To them were added by other authors Gettysburg and Sedan. To these might be added Sha-Ho, sometimes called Mukden. I could say, by way of review, beginning with Marathon, where Greece demonstrated for the first time the supremacy of Europe over Asia by the defeat of Persia, the number of men engaged on either side of these 18 battles was less than those grappling in the battle of the ages since March 21.

The men killed in actual battle in these 18 colossal struggles were less than those slain in the great western battle. The time involved in these 18 battles would not exceed one-half the time already consumed in the fight now going on. The expense of treasure was likewise less and the expenditure of energy due to the terrific enginery of modern warfare probably was less than a hundredth part of that discharged along the bending Hindenburg line since March 21. And while each of those mighty battles was decisive of great questions involved between the contending forces and settled important questions, yet none of them involved so much the fate of the earth's civilization as the one which now rocks the Continent of Europe.

AMERICAN SOLDIERS.

Into this struggle will come the American soldier as the intelligent and vigorous composite of all that is best of the races with or against which he battles, because for 300 years the best have been coming from Europe to America to develop free institutions and representative government. Their manner of life has been of that free and independent character which has developed along brook and in forest with rod and gun; on grounds of manly sport, where individual effort and teamwork combine to develop initiative and teach discipline; and in field and shop their work has been of that varied character which combines activity of hand with freedom of brain. These, combined with that high general mental discipline possessed by the soldiers of no other country, make our soldier, in the final analysis, the warrior of emergency, whether in the final grapple of men or the ultimate clash of armies. [Applause.]

They will be farther from home than were the battling legions who followed Alexander, Cæsar, or Napoleon. They will mingle with and against more different peoples than did the followers of the Macedonian, the Roman, or the Corsican. They may not have the steadiness born of long discipline, which, fixed in the famous phalanx of Macedonia, withstood the shock or broke the lines of the oriental myriads. They will not have the lust of conquest nor the appetite for adventure which carried the great Julius through the barbarous north and west. They may not have that mingling of fatalism with human idolatry which recovered at Marengo, charged Lodi, crossed the Alps, ventured Moscow, and rallied at Waterloo. But in fine physique, clean limb, and bright eye they will be the cynosure of the world's soldiery; in mental grasp they will surpass those of any other battling host. In those fine qualities of chivalry, courtesy, and manliness they will have no equals. Among and against those armies where rank and title stand forever at premium they will be, in the eyes of all, the war's true nobility. And when the call for sacrifice and struggle shall come, none will go more buoyantly to the task, none acquit themselves more bravely, none will account for more of mankind's enemies; and when the victory is won, in the book of merit and achievement they will be accredited first honors of the war. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT].

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is a very important and worthy measure. Its purpose is to make large appropriations for our coast defenses and to protect and defend our country from invading armies.

It has been my pleasure to support all war measures which have come before Congress during the time I have been a Member of the House, and I shall continue to support while I am a Member of this House all measures which will aid and support our armies in the conduct of the war and all those designed to protect our country from invasion.

But, Mr. Chairman, as this bill seems to have the cordial support which it should have from all Members of Congress, you will pardon me if I shall digress for a moment to call to the attention of the House another important measure now pending in the House for its consideration. One of the most important questions for us to consider as a war measure is the production and conservation of food. For the production of food we must depend very largely upon the farmers of this country. While no more patriotic nor energetic class of people exist than the American farmers, in this war we must not depend entirely upon patriotism to win our battles.

This is a war which will be won by the side which can maintain the largest food supplies and can keep its credit unimpaired.

It has been my idea during life that if you wanted our farmers to produce large crops of grains or vegetables, that all they needed was the natural incentive furnished by the idea that the crop they were sowing or planting would bring a good price. I did not believe that the guaranteed price as fixed by the food-control act and the President's order would be as productive of as large crops of wheat as the natural incentive of a fine market which would follow upon the wake of war conditions, but the administration has seen fit to fix a price on wheat at the rate of $2.20 per bushel on No. 1 northern wheat at the principal primary markets, which would mean about $2 per bushel to the farmer at the local elevators for the average wheat raised in the Mississippi Valley, the farmer, of course, having to pay the freight rates on wheat from the local elevator to the nearest principal primary market. Since the fixing of the price by the President at $2.20 per bushel, Mr. McAdoo, the Director General of Railroads, has increased all freight rates 25 per cent, which makes an additional burden upon the farmer and further reduces the price of his wheat. The United States Senate has amended the Agricultural bill passed by the House, so that the minimum price of wheat was fixed at $2.50 per bushel. When the bill was returned to the House, the House refused by a record vote to adopt the amendment and the same is now pending in conference, the Senate refusing to recede from its amendment. It was my pleasure to support this amendment with my vote, but the Members of the House from the cities, the South, and other sections of the country where wheat is not produced outnumbered the Members from the wheat districts and voted to reject the amendment.

I am fully aware of the fact that under present conditions wheat is the least profitable crop raised in this country. The yield in bushels per acre is not large, and when we take into consideration the cost of seed, fertilizer, labor, machinery, interest on money invested in real estate, and so forth, which have all, except interest, doubled in price since the beginning of the war, you can easily see that $2.50 per bushel is not an excessive price for wheat under present war conditions. Another thing we must take into consideration is the scarcity of labor. The present large crop of wheat was made possible by the labor of a large number of young men who since the crop of winter wheat was sown have been taken into the Army and are now either fighting for our country at the front in France or are in our cantonments being prepared and drilled for over-seas duty. When the crop of wheat for 1919 is sown there will be a greater shortage of labor on our farms than there was last fall, and the price of labor will necessarily be very high by reason of such shortage. It necessarily follows that unless the farmer knows that he will be well paid for his wheat he will not be able to sow a large crop next fall.

There is another matter to which my attention has been called by leading farmers and agricultural men of my district in the last few weeks, and that is that owing to the extremely congested condition of the freight traffic of our railroads they will not be able to move this year's crop of wheat at the time of thrashing, and by reason thereof some farmers who thrash early would be able to dispose of their wheat from the thrashing machine, while others would be compelled to store their wheat on the farms until it could be moved by the railroads, thus entailing on these farmers who must store the additional burden of twice handling their wheat and the loss by shrinkage, interest on money invested, and insurance premiums which would necessarily follow.

At the request of these farmers I have introduced a bill to amend section 14 of the food-control act, which reads as follows:

The guaranteed price so fixed shall be the price of said wheat at the time the owner thereof shall offer the same for sale at his local market; and if the said owner of said wheat is unable to dispose of the same in the local market when so offered for sale by him, by reason of the inability of the railroads to move the same and the owner thereof is thereby compelled to store said wheat until the railroads are ready to move said wheat, the said owner shall be allowed an additional sum at the rate of 2 cents per bushel per month to reimburse him for costs of storage, interest charges, insurance premiums, shrinkage, and any other loss or damage which may be occasioned to said owner by reason of the failure of the railroads to move said wheat when so offered for sale by said owner at the local market.

A few days ago I received from the Hon. James P. Goodrich, governor of Indiana, a letter indorsing this bill, which I will read and which is as follows:

STATE OF INDIANA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Indianapolis, June 15, 1918.

Hon. RICHARD ELLIOTT, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I note that you have introduced a bill allowing the farmers 2 cents per bushel per month for storing wheat. I heartily approve your action in this regard, but you do not go far enough. The Food Department is allowing the elevators of the country 2½ to 2¾ cents per bushel per month to cover interest, insurance, and shrinkage in grain, and this charge is not, in my opinion, an unreasonable one, as the interest alone is more than 1 cent a bushel per month, and I feel certain the shrinkage for the first three months after thrashing will be fully as much more, and to this you must add insurance and extra cost of handling. I can see no reason why the farmer should not be allowed the same carrying charge for his wheat as is allowed to the elevators and millers of the country, provided that the farmer will advise his local food administrator that he has a certain number of bushels of wheat ready for delivery and agrees to deliver it at any time upon notice of the Government's desire to have it delivered. This will remove the financial strain from the banks of the country; will also prevent the congestion of traffic that is certain to follow the thrashing of our enormous wheat crop; and will allow the grain to come out as it is needed by the country and our allies.

Unless some action of this kind is taken the farmer will be unjustly discriminated against. Those that thrash early and deliver their wheat promptly will be paid the Government price, but, with the congestion that inevitably must follow, those who can not thrash and deliver their grain promptly will be compelled to sell their grain at a later date at the same price, thereby losing the use of the money and being compelled to stand the shrinkage, cost of insurance, and additional handling.

Very truly, yours, J. P. GOODRICH, Governor.

I was not aware at the time I introduced this amendment to the food-control act that the Food Administrator had been allowing to the millers and elevator men the amounts stated in the governor's letter, but I can readily see that the amount fixed in my bill is too small to cover all of the losses which will be entailed upon the farmers by reason of the storage of their wheat, and when the proper time comes I will ask the Committee on Agriculture, before whom the bill is now pending, to make the amount of compensation for storage 3 cents per bushel per month instead of 2 cents. I have been unable, so far, to get a hearing before the committee on my bill. The chairman of the committee has informed me that he wanted to confer with Mr. Houston, the Secretary of Agriculture, and Mr. Hoover, the Food Administrator, in regard to the bill before he granted a hearing. I noticed in the papers to-day that the President is about to increase the price of wheat, which I hope is true, and if I never get Congress to adopt this amendment it may be that the agitation of the subject will result in the farmers getting what is justly their due.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. I have something I wanted to say to the committee that is not entirely pertinent to the discussion of the bill now before it, and yet it is not very far afield. Some time ago I called the attention of the Members to a possible revolution in Austria. I had discussed last September what I regarded the impossibility of revolution in Germany. I do not believe that there are conditions present in Germany, and have not been at any time, that would promise a revolution there. And any plan of ours built upon the possibility of a revolution in Germany, I think, would be very unwise. But not so in Austria. That is the real polyglot of Europe, a country peculiarly constituted, of very varied and adverse elements. There are a little less than 30,000,000 people in Austria, all told. I do not include Hungary. In that 30,000,000 less than 10,000,000 are the ruling element. They belong to the German population and speak the German language. In religion the Germans in Austria are Catholics, perhaps 85 per cent of them, while over in Germany a great per cent are Protestants. So that the German in Austria and the German in Germany are not a unit on all matters, although in matters of war I think they stand together, without a doubt.

But take the other elements of the 30,000,000, of which the prominent classification is the northern Slav and the southern Slav. Up in the north section of Austria are the famous Czechs, that live in Bohemia. There has been a constant infusion of immigration to America from that section, and we have here in the country a large number of those people, and we find that almost to a man they are very adverse to the Austrian Government. Many of them left here at the outbreak of the war to join the allies against their enemy, Austria. They are subject to the Austrian Government, and yet the Bohemians are holding such a position in Europe that I think it was Napoleon, as I recall it, that said, "The nation that controls Bohemia will control Europe."

I understand that there is to-day an army of 120,000 Bohemians maintained as a separate unit on the western front, fighting against the oppressor of Bohemia—Austria. Whether that fact is well known to all the Bohemians in Austria or not is a question. Next to Bohemia is Moravia, which is populated by the Slovak. We have a great infusion of that element in this country also. They are to a man opposed to the Austrian régime, and are a subject people. Many of these left the United States to join Italy against Austria. Just east of these people is the Province of Silesia, which is also in Austria. This Province is peopled by the Poles, and while they are only a small portion of the Polish peoples of Europe, the larger portion belonging to Russia, now overrun by Germany, yet the Poles in Silesia are very much adverse not only to the Austria but to the German régime, because of the persecution of the Poles over in Germany and their oppression in Austria.

I mentioned once before to the Members here the appearance of Paderewski before a subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in a wonderfully beseeching appeal that the Government here permit the Poles in America to organize a separate unit, not to be brigaded even with the Americans, but remain as a separate unit, to be used on the western front, so that their kinsmen, both in Russian Poland and in Austrian Poland, Silesia, could know that their own people were fighting as an army on the western front for their liberty. These are the dominant elements that belong to the northern Slavs which make up a very respectable portion of the population of Austria.

Then, in the south section of Austria we have the Bohemians, the Serbo-Croats, totally subject, again, to the Austrian Government, and north of them you have the Slovenes, in Slovenia, and then south of Austria, which is now a portion of Austria through the invasion of 1912 and the years immediately preceding, Herzegovinia and Bosnia, peopled also by what we call the Jugo-Slavs. They are the same people that are in Serbia. And the dream of the people in Bosnia, Herzegovinia, and Serbia is that there may some day be a government of the Jugo-Slavs as a separate, independent entity, free entirely from Austria. These elements make up the northern and southern Slav, which is far in excess in numbers to the ruling German element in Austria. Then there are the Italians in Dalmatia, also subject to the Hapsburgs.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Indiana.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman two or three questions right in that connection. Now, what is the population of that part of Austria in Hungary which now and for the last number of months has been predicting an uprising?

Mr. FESS. The uprising is found among the Czechs in Bohemia and the Slovaks in Moravia, and also the Poles in Silesia. Those are the northern Slavs.

Mr. COX. What is the population?

Mr. FESS. The population is not far from 10,000,000.

Mr. COX. That is what I have been informed.

Mr. FESS. And the population of the southern element would probably be about the same or somewhat greater. To be more definite, there are between 19,000,00 and 20,000,000 of these subject peoples out of the 30,000,000 in Austria.

Mr. COX. Now, one more question. I am sure the gentleman and I would agree upon this proposition, that ordinarily our Government would be opposed to conducting a propaganda on the western front or on the Italian front. As a rule we would oppose it. But when we are fighting an enemy, as we are fighting on the Italian front and on the western front, that is fighting us with everything the ingenuity of man can possibly conjure in his brain, what would the gentleman think of the wisdom or the unwisdom of our Nation starting a propaganda, especially along the Italian front, in order to inform that same class of people who are in the Austrian Army exactly why we are fighting and why we are in this war?

Mr. FESS. I am glad my friend from Indiana has put that question, because it is the one thing I want to attract the Members of the House to to-day. That is the one item of supreme interest to this country and the allied cause. I agree with my friend that the niceties of international law might cause us to hesitate to operate in any country outside of our own, but as he says, this is a time of war, and Austria is our enemy, and there are two ways we can operate as a belligerent, and in my judgment we are bound to do both.

There are two ways in which we can make our contest. One is to strengthen our own forces, and the other is to weaken our enemy's forces. When we realize that out of this army called the Austrian Army two-thirds come from subject people who hate the ruling element, and that those men are armed and fighting against their will under a form of duress, it is apparent at once what we can do, if we would in some way conduct a propaganda to affect those soldiers armed under the authority of the German officers and get the real facts in the case before them, first, as to what the allies are fighting for, and, secondly, as to the number of people in the allied armies that belong to the Slovak people and the Jugo-Slavs and the Bohemians, fighting for the same thing that they themselves have been yearning for for years—if we could do that we would weaken the enemy's forces in Austria to the extent, it seems to me, that we could pretty nearly annihilate the Austrian Army and put it out of existence, as has been done by Germany in Russia.

Mr. COX. I hate to take up the gentleman's time, but will the gentleman yield one moment further? I have discussed this matter with the gentleman to some extent.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. COX. Permit me to make this statement: A gentleman is here, and has been here for two months, from New York, a Slovak by birth. He came to this country when four years of age. He is a man who speaks fluently six different languages. He knows all about the Slovak people in this country and the Slovak people of his own country, and he comes here not with generalities at all but with concrete, tangible propositions along the line of meritorious propaganda work. I have endeavored to secure for him an audience with some of the people who are in control of this propaganda work, and so far I have not been able to do it.

I am not casting aspersions on anybody, and I am not criticizing anybody, but I think a professor, now a lieutenant in the Army Intelligence Bureau, who has charge of the foreign propaganda work, would do well to look into the matter a little further. I gave this gentleman a letter of introduction, and some other Members of the House did, in the effort to bring him in contact with those people, not for a job, not for money, but simply with the hope that he could give those people his ideas, and he was met sternly with the reply from the lieutenant who was in charge of this work, "What do Members of Congress know about it? That is none of their business," or words to that effect.

My idea is—it may not be correct—after going over that matter with this man in detail time and time again, that if his suggestions were heeded and our Army Intelligence Bureau would take hold of the situation along the line he has outlined, it would be worth a million of soldiers in Europe. I believe if his ideas were carried out millions of people in Austria-Hungary would rise against their masters, and that would quickly disrupt the Austrian Empire.

Mr. FESS. I am glad the gentleman has made that statement, because I know something about the effort of the gentleman to whom he refers, and I think, as the gentleman from Indiana has just expressed himself, that that gentleman is exceptionally capable, especially in sensing the situation in that country of whose blood he is. However, my concern is expedition to do what is a most strategic possibility. I care not who does it.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. LAZARO. I know the gentleman is a deep student, and his speeches are always interesting.

Mr. FESS. Thank you, sir, for your compliment.

Mr. LAZARO. Will he please tell the House how these people have been held down so successfully during the war?

Mr. FESS. I think I can answer my friend from Louisiana, partially at least. In Germany, for example, a high-grade people, a wonderfully intelligent people, judged from certain standards, have been kept under such a régime that they have lost their individuality and, consequently, their initiative. They are dominated by the ruling element, made up, first, of the members of the royal houses, which will number probably, all told, nearly half a million people. Then come the famous junkers, fairly well understood by the world since this war opened, and, lastly, a large additional population of the class that has gained the recognition which gives them the right to prefix "von" before their names. That makes up a very respectable proportion of the population of Germany, which composes the upper or ruling classes, and, through marriage and intermarriage and affiliation with the army and the navy, they have a relatively small number of people absolutely ruling a very large mass of the German people. Then, as a matter of policy, these who are in government legislate in humanitarian ways by enacting legislation in various forms of old-age pensions, and so on, for the large mass, and thus keep them subject to them, almost as a slave is to a master. You find that the great mass of the German people act in masses, under orders, without any individuality, and quite naturally when they are out where they must act individually, without orders, they are lost, because they have not the initiative. That is why one American with bayonet fixed brought in seven German prisoners the other day. I would like to know how many Germans would ever bring in half a dozen American prisoners at one time? Americans have been brought up in a different school. They take the initiative, while the Germans do not have the initiative.

I say to my friend from Louisiana that you have the same thing, only in a worse degree, in Austria-Hungary. The under class, dreaming of an independent day when they can have their own autonomy, are held down abjectly by legislative propaganda in which the worst discriminations are made by race against race, in various ways—for example, against their own language. Through various methods they are held down abjectly by the ruling class. Germany to-day furnishes mainly the officers of the Austrian Army, and, as is well known, the ruling portion of the Austrian Army is largely made up of Germans.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Could the gentleman from Iowa give me five minutes more? I wanted to say just one more thing.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. LAZARO. Then it is your judgment that they are held down by the Germans?

Mr. FESS. Absolutely. They are held down by the ruling element, which is the German element in Austria, just as they are held down in Germany, only in a more abject form. The subject people in Germany are German, while in Austria they are anti-German.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I would hesitate to yield to anyone just now, but I will yield to my friend if he will be real quick.

Mr. PLATT. Without the Magyars there would be trouble?

Mr. FESS. The Magyars are not in unison with Austria at all. There is a possibility of a break there very quickly if it could be simply directed. It is an open secret that had it not been for the welding power of war the dual monarchy would have gone with the death of Joseph.

Mr. PLATT. But the combination is between the Germans and the Magyars. That is what has held them together.

Mr. FESS. Yes. That is what under the stress of war has held the dual monarchy together. But what I am suggesting is that not so much in Hungary, but especially in Austria, are all the elements of revolution, and we ought to get in there in some way.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, in time of war I think it is the duty of all Congressmen to refrain from interfering in matters which are diplomatic. Congress has not that field. If there is diplomacy to be worked out, that is not in the field of legislation. It might be that there ought to be some consultation here, but that field specifically belongs to the State Department, to the executive department. As to this proposed propaganda, I can see how certain gentlemen may say that Congress has nothing to do with it—that it is not the business of Congress. I appreciate the sensitive character of diplomacy and am inclined to withhold criticism where is left undone in that field what I think should be done. But at the same time, with Congress willing to back up any organized system of propaganda to put out of being the army in our enemy's country, it seems to me we ought not to be thought interfering when we wish to do it. I hesitate to point it out in time of war, if it should appear to be a criticism, on the ground that Congress is not given some rights in diplomacy. I do not mean that at all. I say this, as a very rigid adherent of the prosecution of the war, that I think we have made some mistakes—mistakes of omission. This is one. We may be doing more in that propaganda than we know, but we certainly have not reached the results that are possible. I think without a doubt we have procrastinated in some things in which it would have been very wise for us to have taken action quickly. One thing I think we ought to do at once: We ought to close up the Bulgarian embassy in this city. For months we handicapped the country by neglecting to declare war on Austria. We suffer likewise with the Bulgar. If it is necessary to declare war against that country in order to make use of the American assistance at Saloniki, the most vulnerable point in the enemies' lines, we ought to do it. Diplomacy here, as in case of Austria, prevents our striking at the weak point. It must be apparent to all what success we can have with national secrets with that embassy open at this time. Yet we hesitate to speak openly in this way on the floor of the House, because that is more or less a matter of diplomacy. At the same time, I repeat, that country is our enemy, and Turkey is our enemy, and I am convinced it is a mistake to proceed on the basis that they are our friends when, as enemies of our allies in this character of warfare, they can not be our friends.

Then there is another thing on which I think we are hesitating dangerously. If you will notice what is going on in Russia you may agree with me that it is the most sensitive place in all this war to-day. I am not going to criticize what the administration has not done, but I believe it my duty to say that it would be a wise thing for us to know now that Germany is working there. Germany had before the war a propaganda in operation in Russia with 500,000 Germans. It is difficult to estimate what she now has in that field. Results are ominous, and have been for months. Already the bolsheviki, by simply utilizing the spirit of revolution, have played into Germany's hands and now have been put out of existence by serving as an agency by which Germany has got control of Russia. This morning's press informs us that the bolsheviki have entered into an agreement to allow Germany to exploit Russia. All of this has taken place with no surprise to us, for it has been expected. Yet it seems that we are afraid to take a step for fear of driving Russia into Germany's lap. I am afraid Russia is going into Germany's lap while we are waiting. It is no new thought. From the beginning this has been a field for our operations, if we would but act. Russia is a potential problem. It may be allowed to grow into German power if we procrastinate. It seems to me it would be a wise thing to allow Japan with her forces to enter Russia with the United States by her side to assure Russia that we are not doing anything harmful to her or hurtful to her future development, but to save to her the fruits of a democratic existence. We must watch the movement of Germany in Russia to-day and act soon, lest procrastination at this time, as in the past, becomes a fatal blunder. I just speak of that as one of the things we ought to think about. [Applause.]

We can do nothing better than to assure our allies that we are in the war to win it. We will strike where our forces will count. The arrival of our troops in Europe has already placed a new face on the situation. The part played at the several points by the American soldiers has stimulated the entire fighting force on all fronts. The recent achievements of Italy and her allied assistance are but a part of one great plan now being worked out. I predict a rapid disintegration in Austria, which ought to show itself quite soon in its effect upon Germany and should arouse Russia to her own possibilities if in unison with her allies.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we are all united in support of this fortifications bill, which is in fact, as has been well said, rather a general artillery armament bill, for there are few fortifications provided for in the bill, while enormous sums are provided for arms and munitions for field forces.

I believe the committee have provided abundantly for all possible needs in these lines, no matter how large a force we may be able to gather on the western front, and we hope that that force will constantly increase until it so augments the armies of the allies as to put those forces in a position to take the initiative and drive the enemy across the Rhine.

There are some things that have developed in the hearings on this bill that are not pleasing, that are somewhat embarrassing to the pride of the American citizen. The Nation that developed the first efficient and effective machine gun, the Nation that was among the first of the nations of the world to develop a really high-grade, effective field gun, is still, after more than a year of hostilities, depending and will for some time yet depend practically wholly on the burdened allies for our supply of these classes of arms for our men in France. And, looking beyond these items to equipment not provided for in the fortifications bill, we are reminded of the fact that the Nation that gave the world the flying machine, that made possible the wonderful evolutions of the bird man, is, after all of these months of warfare, practically without fighting planes for our armed forces except as provided by our allies. It is a saddening situation, and it has been accentuated by the fact that when we were making least progress with our program some high in authority took it upon themselves to send broadcast rosy and entirely misleading and untruthful statements of the things we were said to have done and hoped and expected to do. However, after all these delays, unpardonable and indefensible as they are, we are at last, thank heaven, approaching, we hope, the point of quantity production of the necessary arms and munitions of war. This bill will abundantly provide the funds necessary for the carrying on and the extension and the enlargement of our program to the winning of the great contest in which we are engaged. [Applause.] So much for that.

Mr. Chairman, I shall take advantage of the little remaining time granted me to discuss another matter not related to war and armaments, but nevertheless of vital importance, even in these days of war and war preparation.

On July 1 the zone rates as applied to second-class mail matter, unless Congress acts in the meantime, go into effect, and I am constrained to again call attention to the wholly indefensible character of that legislation.

At a time when the necessity of blending the entire body of American citizenship in harmonious unity of view and purpose is the one clear, incontrovertible, and outstanding fact of the situation it is proposed to strike a mortal blow at the agencies which more than all else tend to strengthen and crystallize the national patriotic view and purpose of our people, the newspapers and magazines of the country.

It is urged that these publications should, at least in these war times, pay larger sums for the privileges they enjoy. Assuming for the sake of argument the force of this contention the zone plan can not be defended in support of it, for it will provide the minimum of increased revenue and produce the maximum of confusion, annoyance, injury, and injustice.

The only answer made to the conclusive argument that a system of zone subscription rates for newspapers and magazines would be unworkable, grossly unfair to those far from the centers of publication and menacing to the welfare of the Republic, is the lame and apologetic statement that the additional cost to the publishers of the zone system would be met by a general flat increase in subscription and advertising rates.

If it is to be assumed that the increased costs of the zone system are to be met and covered by flat increases of subscription or advertising rates, or both, that assumption now advanced by the defenders of the zone system constitutes the severest indictment of and the most conclusive argument against the system that has been advanced. Why burden publishers with the annoyance, vexation, hazard, and certain loss of a zone system if zone subscription rates are not contemplated or anticipated? A comparatively small flat increase in postal rates would produce more revenue than the proposed zone rates. What justification is there, therefore, for the archaic, exasperating zone rates if zone charges are not intended to follow?

The fact is there is absolutely no sound or logical argument in favor of a zone system for the transmission of news, current opinion, information, or even current advertising. The system is un-American, unpatriotic, and its tendency will be to increase the provincialism which is a constant menace to free institutions and seriously hamper the development of a true national spirit. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, When Gen. Garfield reported the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill in 1874 he made a speech in which he used this language:

> A very wise man said many years ago concerning the finances of a European kingdom that if one of their annual budgets alone should survive the next deluge, if it were the only fragment left after dry land appeared, from that annual budget alone could be read and reconstructed the entire history of the nation.

How true this is. If this country should be visited with a deluge and nothing should be left but the annual appropriations of Congress during the past 15 months, from these appropriations alone the future historian could write the history of the magnitude of our tremendous task and of the great work of the American Congress, putting in motion every machine and every man in the Republic, in order to win in the most terrible war of all history.

This bill carries more than $5,000,000,000, a stupendous sum, a sum equal to the wealth of the 13 Southern States at the outbreak of the Civil War. And yet the amount appropriated in this bill is confined largely to two items—field artillery and ammunition for field artillery. This bill carries $1,229,031,295 in cash and contract authorizations for field artillery alone. It carries $3,793,134,550 for ammunition for field artillery, a total of $5,013,000,000 for that purpose out of the total of $5,435,000,000 that were appropriated by this bill.

The bill also carries $300,000,000 for the maintenance of mobile artillery. It is out of this fund that all worn-out, destroyed, and captured guns will be replaced. The sums carried for testing armament, subcaliber and accessories, are correspondingly larger, as are practically all the items that go to make up the bill.

It is true the bill does not go into great detail. This is necessarily so. To have appropriated for the thousands of separate things to be purchased would have informed our enemy of our military plans. The items are carried in the customary language of the bill.

I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman, that when it came to making up estimates for this bill there had not been at that time, a time when we had been at war nine months, a more careful and well-devised plan laid for these appropriations. No one, it seems, had foresight, vision, and judgment of the magnitude of our task and what was necessary to do to win in this war. It ought to have been obvious that it would require much more money than was estimated last December for the purpose of this bill. Why, at that time, in accordance with the law, the Secretary of War only estimated for $3,332,000,000 for all the purposes of the bill. And then, with a recklessness that beggars description, additional estimates commenced to flood the Appropriations Committee until, when the committee had finally finished its work and during the deliberations, we were compelled to hold hearings on estimates not yet received by the committee, and so to-day there is a grand total of $9,018,387,981.42 estimated by the War Department for the purposes of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, in making this report of $5,431,000,000 it is the unanimous opinion of the committee that we have given the Secretary of War more money than he can possibly spend during the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made. After the matter was thoroughly gone over it was decided that the bill now carries practically all those who administer the funds estimate will be needed and all they can possibly expend. Speaking for myself, I am sure we have exceeded the productive capacity of the country. And yet it does seem strange that in such times these additional estimates which have not been worked out or matured should come to the committee to disturb its deliberations. They have greatly added to the work of the committee and only tend to confuse. I want to say that in the deliberations of the committee and in marking up this bill there was no division along party or any other lines. There was but one sentiment, and that was to give to the War Department every dollar that could be expended and that was needed for carrying on this war. We are a unit in the report that the bill amply does that. We covered back into the Treasury over $12,000,000 or more that had been appropriated before, which the department says it could not use during the next fiscal year.

There are one or two things I want to call to the attention of the House. I am very sorry that the Congress has not been taken into the confidence of the Secretary of War so far as some of the items of expenditures are concerned. We are reporting out of here $5,000,000,000, but without authority much of that has already been contracted for. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been contracted for plants and plant construction, and Congress now for the first time authorizes such purchases and contracts. Since this Congress convened, without saying one word to Congress and without authority, hundreds of millions of dollars have been so contracted. But the committee feel that in the main it was warranted, that it ought to be done, and we have appropriated the money to pay for it. And in this connection I want to make this observation: The policy is a bad one. Some of these days when peace shall come, if there are millions of dollars of unauthorized contracts, a Congress may not willingly vote the money to pay for the contracts that were made without authority of law. We have been here all of the time ready to act on a moment's notice, and we insist that the Constitution and laws be observed by those clothed with their enforcement.

There is one other thing that I want to call to the attention of the House and to the country and especially to the War Department, and that is a practice that ought to be stopped. It is a practice in the War and in the Navy Departments of selling obsolete cannon and matériel. From March 8, 1913, to May 14, 1914, the Navy Department sold thirty 6-inch guns, 18 of them to Mr. Bannerman, of New York, and 12 to Luria Bros., of Reading, Pa. I will read from a note of Admiral Earle in the hearings with regard to these guns:

> NOTE.—On March 28, 1913, Francis Bannerman, of New York, purchased eighteen 6-inch 30-caliber guns. The price paid for these guns was based on weight of steel and ranged from 53 cents to 71 cents a hundred pounds and, in the case of 11 of the guns, from $12.66 a gross ton to $13.02 a gross ton. The total weight of the guns sold to Mr. Bannerman, including the foregoing, as well as two 8-inch guns was 246,914 pounds. In other words, the price paid by Mr. Bannerman for 6-inch 30-caliber guns was in the neighborhood of $78.67. This was bought by him as scrap value only.
> The Luria Bros., of Reading, Pa., on May 14, 1914, purchased 12 other obsolete 6-inch guns at a total price of $2,386.88. It is quite probable that Mr. Bannerman did purchase these guns from the Luria Bros., although the department has no record as to such a transaction. The guns in the latter case were purchased for less than $200 apiece.

The cost of these guns was about $6,000 each. Eighteen of them were sold to Bannermann for $78.50 and 12 for less than $200 each to Luria Bros., and the Secretary of War in the estimates before this committee asked us to appropriate $15,000 apiece for those guns. In other words, the Navy sold these 30 guns for about $4,000—less than $4,000—and we are asked out of the Treasury of the United States to appropriate $450,000 to buy them back.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will recall, however, Col. McRoberts in his testimony stated——

Mr. GOOD. I am coming to that. There is an estimate in this pending bill for 47 more obsolete guns of the same type and character that the present Secretary of the Navy sold for from $87 to less than $200 apiece to junk dealers, and yet it is here estimated that we should pay the Navy $15,000 apiece for the same kind of guns.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Not now. Admiral Earle says that he thought the price ought to be reduced to $5,000 each. Similar guns were worth nothing but scrap in 1913 and 1914, and were sold as scrap. In this bill the committee is unanimous in reporting a provision that guns of this kind not needed by the Navy should be turned over to the Army if they could be used by the Army.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the gentleman mean to buy these guns back from the people who they were sold to?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; we propose to buy them back, and the bill carries money to purchase them back; but if these guns are purchased back for anything like the amount which the Secretary of War has estimated he will pay for them, I undertake to say that there will be some investigation into the matter.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Bannermann submitted to me at the time of the armed-ship controversy an offer to furnish 6-inch guns for the arming of merchant ships, free of charge, if the Government would take them, and the answer of the Navy Department was that they had no ammunition for those guns.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, these last guns were sold about 90 days before the outbreak of the European war. It is obvious, whether we are at war or not, that the Government of the United States ought never to sell guns of this character. If they are worth nothing but junk they ought to be junked at the navy yard or the arsenals of the United States. When we had our trouble with Mexico the officers who reported that our soldiers were met right across the line with Springfield rifles that were obsolete, that had been sold by the War Department of the United States. They, of course, were sold as junk. If we do not need these guns in one of the branches and they are needed in the other, they ought to be turned over to the other branch. There never has been that speaking relationship between the Army and the Navy with regard to these things that business demands.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. COX. I quite agree with the gentleman, but does not the gentleman think we ought to carry that just a little further? Every time there is an omnibus bill up here to give cannon back to our respective constituencies to beautify some park we fall over one another in order to get a cannon.

Mr. GOOD. I would rather, ten times over, send all of these cannon to the gentleman's district than to give them to junk dealers.

Mr. COX. But I do not want them. I would turn them over to the arsenals and remold them again into cannon.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to use any of the time myself, and as I see now that some of the gentlemen to whom I have promised time have returned to the Chamber I will yield the balance of my time. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me I desire to have read by the Clerk a statement signed by a number of the most prominent business men of Michigan and some of the largest industrial leaders of Detroit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT IN RE JONES AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

JUNE 22, 1918.

We have been informed that Hon. E. N. Hurley, chairman of the Shipping Board, thinks that war prohibition will disorganize labor activities in shipbuilding plants. And the newspapers report that Hon. Bainbridge Colby, of the Shipping Board, has appeared before the Senate Agricultural Committee to protest against the enactment of war prohibition on the same ground.

Detroit is the largest city in America under prohibition. The prohibition law went into effect here on May 1 of this year. A great number of our leading industrial concerns are working on immense contracts for war material. It will therefore be seen that the experience of our large industries as touching the point raised in the objection of the Shipping Board to prohibition is not only valuable but conclusive on this point.

There is no division of opinion among our leaders. They are unanimous in giving emphatic testimony to the wonderful benefits prohibition is producing. Our big concerns are reporting fewer absentees of men, fewer accidents, greater unity, and higher efficiency on the part of their employees. Their men come to work now with clear heads and steady hands on Monday mornings and after holidays.

Detroit's experience has proven beyond a possibility of doubt that the wage earners do not insist on their beer as the price for their loyalty, and that instead of prohibition causing any industrial revolution or disorganization, it, on the other hand, is a most valuable contribution to industrial efficiency, higher productivity, and conservation of man power—all of which are of very vital consideration to our country in these war times.

If the Shipping Board and others who object to war emergency prohibition on the ground that it will cause disorganization of labor or revolution among industrial workers will but study the experience of Detroit they will find that their anxiety on this matter is totally unfounded. After an unexcelled opportunity of studying the value of prohibition in its relation to industrial efficiency, our conviction is that no measure of conservation would be more valuable to our country and its interests at this time than war emergency prohibition.

We, therefore, respectfully submit these considerations and appeal to our National Congress for early favorable action in behalf of this legislation.

Yours, very truly,

Henry M. Leland, president Lincoln Motor Car Co.; Joseph Boyer, president Burroughs Adding Machine Co.; F. S. Bigler, treasurer and general manager Michigan Bolt & Nut Co.; A. R. Demory, vice president the Timken Detroit Axle Co.; John Trix, president American Injector Co.; S. S. Kresge, president S. S. Kresge Co.; Frank P. Johnson, president Detroit Screw Works; F. F. Beall, vice president Packard Motor Car Co.; Richard H. Webber, president J. L. Hudson Co.; Charles M. Carson, manager Cadillac Motor Car Co.; Richard H. Scott, vice president and general manager Reo Motor Car Co.; Chester M. Culver, secretary Employers' Association of Detroit.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS].

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, the matter that I wish briefly to call to the attention of the House at this time is not directly related to the matter we have under consideration. It is, however, of very large public interest at this time. It consists of a letter and accompanying resolutions from the Committee on Public Safety of the State of New Hampshire. This committee has been organized for upwards of a year and consists of a large number of our most patriotic and public-spirited citizens, who have been giving of their time and means and energy to organize our State, its men and industries, in order that we may render effective and efficient cooperation and service in this great war. I shall not take any more time of the committee now, but will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the letter and resolutions referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC SAFETY,
Concord, N. H., June 20, 1918.

Hon. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith a copy of resolutions unanimously adopted by the New Hampshire Committee on Public Safety at its meeting on June 17, 1918.

Very truly, yours,

JOSEPH W. WORTHEN,
Assistant Secretary.

Whereas in the present crisis the public interest demands constant and productive labor from all persons resident in the United States; and

Whereas by selective service regulations and by statute of many States this public necessity has been to great extent translated into legal obligation; and

Whereas there are interned in this country large and increasing numbers of alien enemies and disloyal American citizens of Teutonic origin, whose obligation to this country of their chosen residence does not cease with their internment: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of this committee that in accordance with the dictates not only of national productiveness, but also of justice to loyal Americans, no discrimination permitting idleness of persons so interned should be tolerated, but that any necessary Federal legislation compelling them to work should forthwith be enacted and vigorously enforced; and

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the New Hampshire Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. WALSH. On the bill?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War is authorized to transfer to the owners of the adjacent land, to complete consideration for the transfer to the United States of an easement in other land of said owners, the title of the United States to a right of way now owned by the United States and located between the tract of land known as the Laguna Merced Reservation and an abandoned public highway formerly known as Ocean House Road (also called Ocean Avenue) in the city and county of San Francisco, Cal.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word just to make an inquiry in reference to the paragraph just read. I know that this vast assemblage is very much interested in this measure, but I would like to know what it is intended to do. It says, "To complete consideration for the transfer to the United States of an easement." Has some sort of an agreement been entered into by the department touching this particular project and it has been suspended or interrupted owing to the failure of consideration or the insufficiency of it?

Mr. BORLAND. No; the Government is acquiring an additional tract of land or has acquired it. In connecting this land to enlarge its reservation the road which formerly led out to the ocean-house road becomes no longer available. The road is to be moved from there to another outlet, and as part of the consideration which is to pass to the owner of the land which the Government is acquiring the Government agreed to relinquish its right of way over this abandoned highway. The relinquishment of its right of way constituted part of the consideration of the acquisition of the new land. The Government is acquiring the new land, and the owner has been paid the cash agreed upon, and the only thing remaining to be done is relinquishing the title to the portion of the abandoned highway. The abandoned highway would lead not to any outlet under its present condition. The ocean-house road has been abandoned, therefore the other road connecting with that road would not lead to any highway. Now, when the estimate was received it said "in partial consideration" of the transfer to the United States of an easement. We changed that and made it "complete consideration" in order to show that this was the final act and all that the Government was required to do to acquire the land and easement.

Mr. WALSH. It says to acquire "adjacent land."

Mr. BORLAND. They have acquired it; yes.

Mr. WALSH. That means adjacent to this highway.

Mr. BORLAND. They acquired land in addition to our reservation, and in acquiring that they made part of the terms of the contract that we should relinquish to the former owner this abandoned highway leading out to the ocean-house road.

Mr. WALSH. From the way this paragraph is worded it would appear that this adjacent land is adjacent to the highway, the right of way from which is to be abandoned?

Mr. BORLAND. Well, the wording is that the relinquishment is to the owners of this adjacent land, to wit, adjacent to the abandoned highway. That is exactly the case, and we are relinquishing our right of way over this abandoned highway to the owners of the land which is adjacent to the abandoned highway.

Mr. WALSH. What is the easement of the other land the Government is getting, a similar highway?

Mr. BORLAND. The easement consists of an outlet to a different highway.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture, $500,000,000: Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $729,731,295 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee if he will permit me to revert to the aviation section where there is an appropriation of $8,000,000. I might say this is of very great interest to me, because one of the aviation fields is in my district.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know that I should refuse permission to the gentleman to revert, but this does not refer to aviation fields which the gentleman has in mind. This refers to coast defense.

Mr. FESS. Then this does not go to any portion of the aviation fields like the Wilbur Wright Field?

Mr. BORLAND. Not a cent. This is to provide some permanent coast-defense aviation stations. It does not provide machines, but provides the land, the hangars, quarters for the men, auxiliary buildings, and so forth.

Mr. FESS. May I ask, Are there eight of such places for coast-defense preparations?

Mr. BORLAND. There are eight authorized to be located at the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. FESS. Does that mean there is a million dollars to each?

Mr. BORLAND. One million dollars for each.

Mr. FESS. That being the case, the equipment is going to be rather superior?

Mr. BORLAND. The equipment is pretty well standardized now. The steel frames for hangars and the sizes of the hangars and the repair of machinery, buildings with accommodations for the men, and so forth, are pretty well standardized. They come within $800,000, and then $200,000 is allowed for walks, sewers, water connection, and so forth.

Mr. FESS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. It does not refer to the machines.

Mr. FESS. It might be of interest to Members, however, if I might say that I was over home, coming back yesterday, and in talking with the president of the Wright Aeroplane Co. he gave me these figures: Up to June 22 they have shipped 421 battle planes and on last Saturday they shipped 36 battle planes. These are not training planes; they are battle planes, and all those came from the plant at Dayton.

Mr. COX. How many have they got all together under contract?

Mr. FESS. I did not ask, but it is tremendous.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. This appropriation of half a billion dollars and authorization to enter into contracts for $279,000,000 additional provides for the carriages for the cannon. This war has developed that cavalry on the European front is virtually an arm that is no longer of value in making attacks, and, further, that in the transportation of supplies the motor car and motor trucks have come and have supplanted the horse for conveyance purposes. Should the war last another two years, I predict that great advances will be made in the development of motor trucks that are particularly suited for the carriages of our mobile artillery.

Up to the present time I question whether the Bureau of Ordnance has advanced very far in the development of a modern carriage which is part and parcel of motor trucks. We have done much in providing for railway carriages for heavy field artillery, but what is especially needed is for our American motor-truck manufacturers, in connection with the Bureau of Ordnance, to devise some motor carriage that will not be too heavy and yet stable enough to carry our light mobile artillery. The Bureau of Ordnance has, in a minor way, made some experiments along that line, but it is far from a stage which can be stated to be in any way practicable. Not only will motor trucks be utilized for the carriage attachment of field artillery, say of the 3-inch and lesser bore guns, but it is bound to be utilized in the transportation of rapid-fire guns of all characters; and, in that connection, I would not be surprised if the motorcycle will also be put to good use for men connected with our rapid-fire arms. I rise on this occasion merely to suggest the advisability of having the field-artillery carriages connected with motor trucks, so that on the spur of the moment they can be transferred to places of safety and not fall into the hands of an enemy in the case of a sudden attack.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what he thinks the department should do about the guns referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], if he has any definite views on the subject.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman mean the Bannerman guns?

Mr. GILLETT. The guns that were sold and then repurchased. I think it would be well for Congress to show its attitude on the subject.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the committee came to an agreement on the subject. I have some very positive and clear-cut notions on the subject of those guns, and I have an equally positive and clear-cut notion that a Member of this great legislative body, the greatest in the world, I think, should reserve to himself individually entire freedom of criticism, and I have always reserved that to myself. This is one of the points in which the committee felt justified in calling the attention of the department quite sharply to what at the very best was an ill-considered and hasty estimate, one which it was necessary for the committee to itself thrash out for the benefit of the department. An estimate was sent in for these guns in conjunction with some guns that it was purposed to acquire from the Navy. A list of the guns was given, and the prices were attached to the guns, and the committee was asked to make an appropriation covering this estimate.

In the hearings it developed that all of the guns were not to be acquired from the Navy. The question was at once raised that if we did acquire guns from the Navy why we should pay for them, except by a transfer of a bookkeeping account. It developed, however, that 30 of these guns were to be acquired from a man by the name of Francis Bannerman, and the committee then instituted an inquiry as to where he got the guns and whether they were saleable guns; whether they, of course, being secondhand guns, were still available. It was manifest to the committee, and will be manifest to this House, that it was desirable for the department to acquire guns that were serviceable from any source that they could, confronted, as we were, with the necessity of manufacturing a large number of guns with consequent delay. If we could acquire guns that were already in existence and that were serviceable in the field, manifestly it was wisdom to acquire them. And Congress had provided ample means to acquire material in case of war. This man Bannerman was guilty of the boldest piece of profiteering, the boldest piece of effrontery, that has ever come to my attention since I have been a Member of Congress. He was demanding $15,000 apiece for obsolete, secondhand naval guns.

I called the matter to the attention of the department and asked them if they knew where Bannerman had acquired the guns, when and how, and how much he had paid the Navy Department for them. They said they had no knowledge on the subject. Then I took the matter up with the chairman of the Naval Committee, and asked him if he had any knowledge of the right of the Navy to dispose of guns, and what they did with them. He suggested that I call Admiral Earle, Chief of Ordnance of the Navy. I called him. He was extremely helpful and cooperated in every way. The guns had been sold before he came into power, but he investigated and laid the facts before us. I incorporated his statement in the record, and I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] read it to the House in full.

In 1913 Bannerman bought 18 of these guns from the department for the price of scrap steel, aggregating about $78 a gun. It appeared also that Luria Bros., of Pittsburgh, had bought 12 guns of the same class, aggregating less than $200 a gun, and Bannerman probably had acquired the Luria gun, making 30 in all. These were guns taken off the cruisers of the type of the Newark. They were short-range guns of a type that is now obsolete in the American Navy, and can not be used on war vessels on account of their shortness of range, but they were exceedingly useful for land forces. That was agreed by all the witnesses. As soon as that was ascertained, we called the Chief of the Production Division of the War Department, Col. McRoberts, and he assured us that no contract had been entered into with Mr. Bannerman for these guns and none would be entered into until information had been received as to the price at which the guns had been bought. As soon as the matter reached that stage, we ascertained that Mr. Bannerman was on the point of selling his guns, or claimed to be, to a Latin-American country. It was very easy to take prompt action and see that the Export Board issued no export license for those guns. It was absolutely vital to the rights of the Federal Government that we should have the guns and that not a gun be exported from this country without the authority of the Federal Government; and none was exported.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. COX. If this man Bannerman is guilty of profiteering, he had to have somebody that had the power to sell the guns to him, and who was it that sold them to him? It looks as if somebody behind him should come in for criticism.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know who sold him the guns or under what system our Navy has been disposing of that class of materials. But I have no doubt that there has been some general policy extending back a number of years. The fact of the matter is, a great deal of the so-called condemned Army and Navy stores have been sold to these brokers, of whom Mr. Bannerman is probably chief, and has been disposed of advantageously to other countries.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he and his committee have been unable to learn who is responsible for the sale of these guns and who sold them?

Mr. BORLAND. I have not said we were unable to learn, but I will say they were not sold under the jurisdiction of the present Chief of Ordnance of the Navy. I tried to ascertain who was responsible, but it did not seem practicable at that time. The committee has no jurisdiction over any of the departments of the Navy. Our committee is not purely an investigating committee. I could not pursue the matter any further than to be able to say that Uncle Sam can get the guns. That is the first proposition, and the second is, we will settle with Mr. Bannerman on fair terms.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. How does the price which Mr. Bannerman asked for the guns compare with the present cost of producing the same type of gun?

Mr. BORLAND. The guns were produced at a cost of a few dollars less than $6,000 per gun. Mr. Bannerman asked $15,000 for them per gun.

Mr. SNYDER. How does it happen that this vast amount of money, based on this $15,000 per gun, appears in the appropriation bill?

Mr. BORLAND. It does not appear; and that is exactly what I want to make clear to the House. Not a dollar appears in this bill for the $450,000 estimated by Mr. Bannerman.

Mr. SNYDER. I understood that the appropriation did appear for the purchase of these guns.

Mr. BORLAND. It was stricken out. We purpose—and we have so indicated our intention to the officials of the War Department—we purpose that if Mr. Bannerman will not submit an offer satisfactory to the Ordnance officers of the Government, the Government can exercise the power to commandeer the guns and settle the matter with him in court.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there was an estimate submitted covering the purchase of these guns on the basis of $15,000 apiece?

Mr. BORLAND. An estimate was submitted covering the purchase of these guns on the basis of $15,000 apiece, and some from the Navy. We did not allow either.

Mr. MONDELL. What possible justification—what basis could there be for an estimate of that sort?

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman wants to go a little further into the facts about it, I will say that the officer who submitted that estimate is no longer an officer of the War Department. I pursued this inquiry to the bottom.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COX. Has he been discharged or has he resigned?

Mr. BORLAND. No. He has been sent to the field.

Mr. COX. I doubt if he is competent to be sent to the field. He ought to be recalled.

Mr. BORLAND. I am generous enough to believe that it was due to an absolute lack of information or experience by some one under that department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It might be said in justice to the present officer in charge of the matter, Col. McRoberts, that he stated that when it came to the purchase of these guns he wanted to know the price that had been paid for them, and that price would have a great bearing on the price he would name on the part of the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a curious commentary on governmental methods that that kind of an estimate could get through without regard to who originated it.

Mr. BORLAND. When I referred to that matter I did not mention the fact that Col. McRoberts was the present Chief of the Production Division. I wanted to make that clear, in justice to Col. McRoberts, who was in charge of the Production Division, who testified at the beginning that the estimate was not the basis of any contract entered into or any tentative arrangement; that he did not propose to deal with Mr. Bannerman on those terms, or anything like them, but proposed at the very initiation of the negotiations to ascertain what the guns had cost Mr. Bannerman at the Navy Department, and would only deal on the basis that would thereby be established.

Mr. SNYDER. Did it develop in your investigation that Mr. Bannerman had made any proposition at all on these guns to the department? Did he make any offer at all to sell the guns?

Mr. BORLAND. It is my understanding that the price asked was $15,000, or $450,000 for the 30.

Mr. PLATT. I understand that the Navy Department charges the Army $25,000.

Mr. BORLAND. No; $5,000.

Mr. PLATT. It says here in the hearings $25,000.

Mr. BORLAND. That is for the guns and mounts.

Mr. PLATT. On page 215 of the hearings the cost of the 6-inch gun is set down at $25,000 apiece.

Mr. BORLAND. Whose testimony is that?

Mr. PLATT. Gen. Dixon's.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will turn to the testimony of Admiral Earle, he will find that he lists them at $5,000 and the mounts cost a certain sum.

Mr. SNYDER. This is just for the barrel, but not the mount?

Mr. BORLAND. It is the gun tube, just as it is taken off the ship.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from New York think, because the Navy charges the Army $25,000, that this gentleman who bought them for $200 is justified in charging $15,000 for them?

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps not; but I do not think it makes any great difference what he paid for them. The question is what they are worth. They ought to have had sense enough to know what they were worth when they were selling them. The fact is the Government acts like a child in this business, especially under this administration. It does not appear to know what it is doing at all.

Mr. BORLAND. My information is that the sale of these guns, and other sales, has been part of the policy of the Navy, extending back many years, and that is the reason why I feel perfectly free to discuss it on the theory that there can not be anything partisan in any criticism that the Members of the House may make touching these transactions. I know that this has been the policy of the department, because this man Bannerman has built up a business of considerable extent, and had built it up long before the existence of the present administration. I assume that Mr. Bannerman, when he buys condemned Army stores in time of peace and finds that instead of scrap steel he has a gun that is serviceable and that can be used in the field, has the right that any other owner possessing the full title and dominion of property would have to use the property for the most available purpose. I assume that if he bought it as scrap steel and found it to be a good gun, he could sell it to any friendly country that desired to buy it for any price upon which they could agree. I assume that if we were before a court of justice and Mr. Bannerman's property had been taken forcibly out of his possession he could demand pay for it not as scrap steel, not on the basis on which he bought it, but on the basis of its actual availability for use. And I imagine that in spite of all we can do that great principle of the Constitution which protects the private ownership of property will protect even a man in Mr. Bannerman's condition. I do not doubt that if Mr. Bannerman goes into court he will be paid some fair price for his property; but I am perfectly confident that a mistake has been made in submitting to Congress an estimate of $15,000 for these guns that cost $6,000 when they were new.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Right on that point, the extraordinary thing about this entire matter, it seems to me, is that estimate of three times the manufacturing cost, submitted in the ordinary way through the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury, and coming to the committee, an estimate of which, I presume, Mr. Bannerman might have been informed, and an estimate which, if allowed, so far as this committee goes, would have been used to pay for these guns at three times the cost of manufacture.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is no more amazed than I was when I discovered it.

Mr. MONDELL. Is that as closely as estimates are scrutinized, does the gentleman think?

Mr. SNYDER. It strikes me this estimate was fairly well scrutinized by the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, estimates are always well scrutinized by the committee.

Mr. BORLAND. I agree with the gentleman from Wyoming that the committee ought not to have the burden of that scrutiny; and yet, it is the duty of every official who detects a matter of that kind to safeguard the interests of the Government absolutely; and I am satisfied that Col. McRoberts, who detected it about the same time that the committee detected it, took exactly the same view of the situation that the committee took.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman has stated what I think is perhaps a correct proposition of law; but I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that we have recently enacted a law which enables the Government to take material of this kind and use it and pay for the use of it. Now, Mr. Bannerman bought junk. He paid the junk price for it. He can not complain, can he, if the Government of the United States, exercising the provisions of the recent act, takes these guns and uses them and returns the junk to him at the end of the war, paying him a reasonable price for it?

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, the gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. BORLAND. I think that sounds better than it would really work out.

Mr. PLATT. But Mr. Bannerman did not pay junk prices.

Mr. BORLAND. He paid scrap-steel prices.

Mr. PLATT. He bought these things as obsolete Ordnance stores, and he offered some of these guns to the Government free of charge, offered them for the purpose of arming ships, and the Government said they could not use them. That being so, why are they trying to buy these guns now?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is introducing evidence that is not in the record, as far as I know. The gentleman seems to know more about this——

Mr. PLATT. The trouble is that the Government does not know what it is about.

Mr. HICKS. While the thing is being talked about, it is only fair to the people that we should know who that man is who submitted that estimate.

Mr. BORLAND. I have the great pleasure of not even knowing his name.

Mr. MONDELL. Does not the gentleman know the name of the Secretary of War?

Mr. HICKS. I mean, the man in the Ordnance Department.

Mr. MONDELL. But the Secretary of War can not shift the responsibility onto some poor little subordinate.

Mr. BORLAND. It is perfectly manifest that the Secretary of War is not familiar with all the details of every estimate submitted, and that is one of the unfortunate features of our system.

I am a strong believer, and am becoming a stronger believer every day, in the theory of Cabinet officers occupying places on this floor. The more these things occur the more I am confirmed in that opinion. I do not know that I share the opinion of a distinguished colleague of mine who says that it would tend to puncture a good many reputations. Possibly that is true and possibly not; but, at least, I think it would aid the Members of this House in a great many of these matters in which they ought to have the advantage of direct information from an executive officer. Under our system of government, executive officers speak here only through committees. As I say, I have never assumed that it was the right or function of the committee to justify whatever an executive officer happened to do. An executive officer is responsible, technically and legally, for the acts of his subordinates; but in this case the subordinates of subordinates probably committed the error, which was detected by a man of greater authority, like Col. McRoberts, and which undoubtedly would never have escaped final scrutiny. Now, I want to say, as to the action of the committee, that we have stricken out the $450,000 estimate, and the department knows now that the view of the committee is that unless it can agree upon another and a different price with Mr. Bannerman the department should commandeer the guns and submit the matter in the ordinary way. If it is agreed upon at a different price, then it must still submit an estimate and come to the committee for the money with which to carry out any proposed bargains. So I assume that the matter is completely in the hands of Congress, and that the interest of the Government will be protected.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have before me page 322 of the hearings, where Col. McRoberts states that these negotiations were made through some person in the Navy Department. Now, it is a well-known principle of law that fraud vitiates every contract. The contract purchasing these guns from the Navy Department was tainted with fraud. Why is not that an important element in determining the value that the Government puts upon these guns and the amount the Government would be compelled to pay for the guns if taken and commandeered and paid for later? The whole contract is a fraud on the Government.

Mr. BORLAND. If the Government could prove fraud, the legal principle mentioned by the gentleman might apply.

Mr. ROBBINS. We would get all the guns back for less than $2,000, the price paid, instead of $30,000, the price asked.

Mr. BORLAND. The Government might not be able to prove fraud on the part of Mr. Bannerman. What fraud would Mr. Bannerman be guilty of?

Mr. ROBBINS. They were procured from the Government as junk, whereas they were good ordnance. Some one concerned in this sale in the Navy Department condemned these cannon as useless, whereas they were useful, and this was a fraud on the Government.

Mr. BORLAND. They were sold by the Navy, as I understand it, because they had been classed as obsolete guns for the Navy. The Navy was not in the business of furnishing the land forces with guns, but Mr. Bannerman evidently contemplated that he would have a market for the guns, which he afterwards found.

Mr. ROBBINS. I was not criticizing Mr. Bannerman; it is the miserable system under which the ordnance is handled and disposed of by the Navy Department that I am condemning most strongly.

Mr. BORLAND. I feel like being perfectly frank with the House, and there is no danger of our voting any money until the new estimate is submitted.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not know whether Mr. Bannerman is subject to all the criticism we have leveled against him. I hardly think so. I do not think he is to be criticized. The evidence seems to be that some of the guns were not only obsolete, but perhaps were not valuable for the purposes for which they were constructed. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri that the system is wrong and ought to be corrected. I believe that in calling the attention of the War and the Navy Departments, as we have in this case, to what was about to be perpetrated here on the National Treasury will perhaps result in some improvement. At the same time I want to make a suggestion that the War Department might take judicial notice of the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] said that these guns had been offered to the Navy free of charge. Mr. Bannerman certainly ought to be commended for that patriotic and generous act. I doubt not if he would give them to the Navy free of charge he would loan them to the Army free of charge, and therefore the Army will get them without any more than the original cost, with probably a fair sum for storage, interest charges, and so forth. I think that ought to be the result, and I have no doubt it will be the result if it is looked after in the same way the committee has tried to investigate the whole subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith, the machinery necessary for its manufacture, and necessary storage facilities, $2,000,000,000: Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $1,793,734,550 in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like some information from the chairman of the committee. I understand this is the section out of which the nitrate plant is to be built.

Mr. BORLAND. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. In the original appropriation of $20,000,000, as I understand from the hearings, they only used $5,000,000 for a nitrate plant. By what authority was the money transferred to some other use?

Mr. BORLAND. By authority of the President.

Mr. SNELL. Was that the intention when the original act was passed, that it should be used in water-power development?

Mr. BORLAND. The language of the appropriation, which is rather singular, carries with it, on a careful reading, this impression, that it was designed to use the $20,000,000 under the act of 1916 for experimental development in the production of nitrate in this country for two purposes—ammunition and agriculture. As a part of the experimental development in producing our own supply of nitrate, it was contemplated that the experiment should involve the possibility of using water power. That language is all embraced in the same wording of the appropriation. The munition idea, the agricultural idea, the water-power idea, are all present, if the gentleman will read carefully. Now, as I understand it, they have used a little more than $5,000,000——

Mr. SNELL. Five million and three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BORLAND. No; $6,700,000, including the purchase of land for experimental purposes. The balance, $13,300,000, has been devoted to lock and dam No. 2, at Muscle Shoals.

Mr. SNELL. In all these discussions as to the construction and development of a nitrate plant it has been said that we should have a hydroelectric plant. As I understand, there are four plants building at the present time. In plant No. 1 they do not intend to use any hydroelectric power, but entirely steam.

Mr. BORLAND. Partly steam and partly hydroelectric power brought from the Black Warrior River.

Mr. SNELL. As I understood, they would use steam.

Mr. BORLAND. They have a steam plant.

Mr. SNELL. No. 2 is at Muscle Shoals, and they will have water power part of the year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is the purpose to use hydroelectric power as well as steam in both plants.

Mr. SNELL. In No. 2 they will use hydroelectric power when they have it, about nine months of the year. In plant No. 1 at Sheffield they would probably use almost entirely steam power.

Mr. BORLAND. No; plant No. 1 is located at Sheffield—that is 3 miles from Muscle Shoals—and my understanding is that while they have a steam plant installed they have a transmission line from the Black Warrior.

Mr. SNELL. Nearly 85 miles away.

Mr. BORLAND. Eventually, when the power is developed at Muscle Shoals, they will transmit the power from Muscle Shoals. The amount of power used in the nitrate plant No. 1, Sheffield, is comparatively small, about 6,000 horsepower.

Mr. SNELL. From six to ten thousand horsepower.

Mr. BORLAND. The amount that can be used at the nitrate plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals approaches 100,000 horsepower.

Mr. SNELL. Practically 100,000.

Mr. BORLAND. So between them they will use all the available horsepower with considerable steam accessory.

Mr. SNELL. I notice that plant No. 3 is to be divided, a part located at Toledo and a part in Cincinnati, or Elizabethtown, near Cincinnati. Can the gentleman tell why those locations were chosen?

Mr. BORLAND. The question was asked, and the answer was that at those points there was available a large surplus of steam-generated electric power.

Mr. SNELL. Each one of those plants will take practically 50,000 horsepower?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman means there is that much excess power at the present time in one of those places.

Mr. BORLAND. There was either that much excess or facilities for enlarging the commercial plants to produce that excess.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Neither one of those points will be favorably located for manufacturing power from coal?

Mr. BORLAND. I am not familiar enough to know. They are both manufacturing points, I presume, and are favorably located.

Mr. SNELL. I understood from Col. Joyce that neither was located for the manufacture of power by coal.

Mr. BORLAND. I have no knowledge.

Mr. SNELL. Then, really, out of our four plants for nitrates that we have been talking about all these years we have only one, or perhaps two, that have hydroelectric power for a part of the year?

Mr. BORLAND. Two. Let me say this: Those plants are being constructed by the Air Nitrate Co.—Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4—or will be, and that is a subsidiary of the General Chemical Co.

Mr. SNELL. They are being constructed on a commission basis?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. A cost-plus basis?

Mr. BORLAND. And they are to be operated upon a commission basis. The General Chemical Co. owns the basic patents for the making of nitrate by——

Mr. SNELL. I think their process is synthetic.

Mr. BORLAND. They own some patents relating to the cyanamid process. They are the practical and successful makers of nitrate by that cyanamid process. My understanding is, of course, that after this war is over we are going to reduce our number of plants. We will not need them on a peace basis. Somebody will have to take them off our hands, and I have no doubt that as shrewd business men the General Chemical Co. are figuring on taking Nos. 3 and 4 off our hands. Inasmuch as they have the right to locate them, and will have a favorable opportunity to bid upon them, I presume that they would exercise the best business judgment they have and locate them where they could be economically conducted.

Mr. SNELL. They operate them on a cost-plus basis?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. I presume that as business men, as they have the right to select a location, they will select a favorable one. As to Nos. 1 and 2, there is a chance that the Government may retain those because of this agricultural feature of producing nitrates for fertilizing purposes and owning the power, which is the important factor at Muscle Shoals. We may find it advantageous to either retain all of those plants or lease them out on favorable terms in connection with our power, and so those plants were said to be quite favorably located from a governmental standpoint.

Mr. SNELL. The Government actually owns the power at Muscle Shoals?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. What proportion of the $2,000,000,000 is supposed to be used for nitrate production?

Mr. BORLAND. The plant at Muscle Shoals cost $40,000,000, and the other two plants will cost approximately $55,000,000 between them.

Mr. SNELL. And that is all that is to be used?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; that is all that is authorized.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I noticed an announcement in the newspapers a few days ago that a picric-acid plant was to be located at Brunswick, Ga., and one at Little Rock, Ark.; that approximately $11,000,000 were to be expended at these places for these plants. Out of what appropriation is that money to be expended.

Mr. BORLAND. It is this appropriation, the appropriation for ammunition for field artillery.

Mr. KAHN. It is an item carried in this present bill?

Mr. BORLAND. It is not an item. It is one of the items which make up this aggregate sum.

Mr. KAHN. It is to come out of the lump sum?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I knew that the Military Committee had not appropriated anything for such a purpose.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; it is in this item. It was estimated for.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition, subcaliber guns, and other accessories for seacoast artillery practice, including the machinery necessary for their manufacture, $1,700,000.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is with some difficulty that those of us who are not on the committee understand the very large appropriations that are in this bill in the shape of large lump-sum items, like the $2,000,000,000 appropriation under the head of "armament" for the manufacture of cannon, ammunition, and procuring facilities for such purpose. I have looked through the hearings to find where the plant known as the Neville Island ordnance plant of the United States Government is to be established under the provisions of this bill, and I find on page 543 of the hearings a mere mention of what is the last of the great armament plants that will round out the facilities of the United States Government to create ordnance, armor plate, and munitions sufficient for supplying its own needs. This plant is to be built by the United States Steel Corporation at Neville Island, Pa., for the purpose of constructing large guns, and be in every way complete. We have heard from the opening statement of the chairman of the committee made in explanation of this bill that the Government has already established an armor-plate plant at Charleston, W. Va.; that it has also established and is building a number of powder plants throughout the various parts of the country; and that it now proposes to erect a large Army gun plant at Neville Island, in the Ohio River, below Pittsburgh. I wish at this opportunity to commend highly the selection of this site for a plant for such purpose.

There could be no more advantageous site selected for a large Government gun plant than at Neville Island. The Navy has its gun plant here in Washington. Just why Washington City was selected for it I never could understand, but there is a different reason, and a very good reason also, pertaining to the selection of Neville Island, near Pittsburgh, for a large Army gun plant. It is the coal and iron center of the United States. Pig iron can be obtained cheaper at Pittsburgh, within a few miles of the location of this gun factory—indeed, within 10 miles of it—than any other point in the United States. This island is located 6 miles below Pittsburgh, in the Ohio River. The island itself is about 4 miles long and over 1 mile wide and entirely level, above the high-water mark, and within the first pool of Ohio River slack water below Pittsburgh, which is formed by the Davis Island Dam, which is a movable dam. This ability to raise or lower the wickets of this dam affords a quick and easy means of keeping an ample stage of navigable water around this island at all times. The raw material that is necessary to manufacture large guns is here in greater abundance and cheaper than at any other point in the country. Here is the pig iron, the coal, the Connellsville coke, the only coke in the United States that burns perfectly at the melting zone of iron in a blast furnace. All seem to meet here in a common originating market. When these guns are made they can be cast from the pig iron which will be melted in the furnaces located near by, and the molten metal can be transported to Neville Island before it cools and molded into guns. The necessary fuel can be obtained there in great abundance by water at all times in the year, and there are on the Ohio River steamboats and barges furnishing abundance of water transportation. The Government has already undertaken to complete slack-water navigation clear down to the Mississippi River by the installation of locks and dams under the $5,000,000 appropriation carried in the present river and harbor bill. The guns when finished can be taken down the river on boats to New Orleans and transported by ships to Panama and to all our forts and coast defenses along the seacoast, and even by the canal to the Pacific coast, also by water, which is the cheapest means available and the best method of transportation. The only thing that seems to be lacking to complete this unit is the testing ground, and that can be found somewhere in the vicinity. Now, there is one other fact in regard to this location that is worthy of mention. This is an old historic island.

It was settled prior to 1755 by the French. It was in 1755 that Braddock attempted to wrest the headwaters of the Ohio from the French and failed when defeated at Braddock field, 10 miles east of Pittsburgh, then called Fort Duquesne. It was commanded by the French fort. It was captured in 1768 by Gen. John Forbes and remained a British possession until the Revolution. The oldest Presbyterian church in western Pennsylvania stands upon that island. With all its historic associations, it is a spot held in affectionate regard by its inhabitants. It is a garden spot. Early garden vegetables from its fertile fields supply the markets of the great city of Pittsburgh, near by. The citizens of that island, notwithstanding all this, met the real estate agents of Pittsburgh and they jointly fixed the price of the ground of that island that was commensurate with and equal to the sales which took place before the war, and all agreed to turn over their homes to the Government at the price thus fixed. So that here is one place in the country—and I point to it with some pride, because it is near my district—where there will not be a cent of profiteering against the Government of the United States for obtaining a site. [Applause.] More than that, this plant will be built by the United States Steel Corporation and turned over to the United States Government for $1 in excess of the actual cost, and the United States Government will have its engineers and experts on every part of this work from the day the first furrow is turned over for the foundation until the smoke curls out of the chimney of the completed factory. Now, I think an incident of that sort should have been noticed in the report made by the committee on this bill. Testimony was taken, no doubt. There is no reason why it should be concealed and not printed, and I have thought as we pass these great appropriations here in Congress and provide for these vast improvements, where so frequently criticisms and charges of extortion and profiteering are made, and which come to us from some of the cities of the country where the United States has located war activities, that we ought not to let this one place pass by unnoticed where we know there will be no profiteering, and where the United States Government will be getting value received promptly and quickly from every dollar it expends. This is only another evidence of the patriotism of western Pennsylvania and the great city of Pittsburgh. Pennsylvania has answered our country's call by sending over a hundred thousand of her best young men into the various branches of the military service. But this is not all she has done in this world war for liberty. She has sent many more thousands into the coal mines and to the burning furnaces to produce coal and manufacture iron, without which this Nation could not overcome and conquer the brutal Hun. Day and night these patriots toil. Day and night there arises from the furnaces and forges of western Pennsylvania a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of flame by night which will lead the United States to complete victory over Germany and her allies. I vote for this bill with a feeling of satisfaction and pride, because I am not only sustaining our President and our Government in waging this war but I am in my humble way aiding the great American Republic in building the greatest ordnance plant in the world, which will deal the death blow to German militarism. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The following portions of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for fortifications in the continental United States, respectively, shall be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury, namely, $2,000,000 for construction of gun and mortar batteries; $20,540.19 for procurement or reclamation of land, or rights pertaining thereto, etc.; $1,995,000 for the construction of land defenses in the United States, etc.; $400,000 for contingent expenses incident to the construction of seacoast fortifications and their accessories; $3,744,000 for purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defense, etc.; and $2,000,000 for the alteration and maintenance of seacoast artillery, etc.; in all, $10,159,540.19.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I merely want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understand it is not intended by covering these amounts into the Treasury, part of which I believe was appropriated for work at Fort Story, to abandon the work at that point, but simply to defer that improvement. Am I right?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia is entirely right about it. Part of this appropriation was for the construction of gun and mortar batteries at Fort Story, Cape Henry, and in pursuance of the general policy applied to all constructions the construction of emplacements has been deferred until we can be sure of having the guns ready. The holding back on the program of big guns has made it unnecessary to proceed with the plans for the construction of gun emplacements. So that this money which is turned back is part of the money which was expected to be used for gun emplacements—16-inch guns. The turning back of this money, therefore, in common with several other points, embracing not only Cape Henry but several other points, is in pusuance of the general policy of improvements. When the ordnance factories of the United States are reasonably able to provide the guns the emplacement program will be resumed, probably upon the same plan as that on which we have been heretofore working.

The Clerk read as follows:

For current expenses of the ordnance proving grounds, comprising the maintenance of rail and water transportation, repairs, alterations, accessories, and service of employees incidental to testing and proving ordnance and ordnance matériel, hire of assistants for the Ordnance Board, purchase of instruments and articles required for testing and experimental work, building and repairing butts and targets, clearing and grading ranges, $1,573,722.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] in his presentation of the various provisions of this bill. He brought to our attention the fact that the Midvale Steel Co. is engaged to some extent upon Government contracts and that the Government would not be called upon to supply the company with much money to carry out the contracts now existing or to be made for certain work. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] told us in eloquent terms of the new plant to be erected at Neville Island and of the advantages which would accrue by reason of such location in the way of materials of all kinds and because of the presence of much skilled labor in that locality.

The mention of the Midvale Steel Co. reminded me of the fact that on May 11 last the officials of that company instituted a new departure, which came to be known as "pledge day"—a day which will go down into history as one of the most eventful in the history of Johnstown and of the great industrial plant. On the day mentioned there were gathered together the president, vice president, treasurer, general manager, and superintendent of the steel company, an admiral of the United States Navy, two soldiers who saw duty in the front-line trenches, a judge of the District Court of the United States, a judge of an appellate court, a judge of a common pleas court, a Polish priest, two Catholic priests, three ministers, and a visiting Congressman, all of whom were taken from one end of that great plant to the other in a specially provided train, and from early morning until late in the evening urged upon that loyal army of workmen the necessity of being constantly employed, in order that our Government may be fully prepared to win the great war, and I take pleasure in reporting that the appeals brought forth a hearty and generous response from the thousands of workmen who heard them. During the discussion upon the bill the question was asked whether or not a plant could be constructed which could turn out large guns before the end of the year 1920. Assurance was given that such a plant could be built, and with such dimensions and detail as would provide for the use of steel from the billet to the finished product, and even from the ore. While this statement may appear startling to many persons, I am prepared to give it credence because of the fact that in Johnstown, where the Midvale Steel Co. operates its largest plant, a blast furnace was constructed and actually fired in less than 90 days—a record, as I am informed.

Much depends upon the character, ability, and loyalty of the men employed in our great works to fit our Government for the present emergency, and I desire to commend the plan adopted by the officials of the Midvale Steel Co. to bring about harmony between employer and employee and as well relations mutually helpful.

I have supported every measure introduced to prosecute this war to a successful finish, and shall support this bill for the same reason, and in the belief that the league of nations to be formed at the close of the present conflict will be able to save the people from the horrors of another war.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following portions of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for fortification of the Panama Canal, respectively, shall be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury, namely: $1,500,000 for the purchase, manufacture, and test of seacoast cannon for coast defense, etc.; and $600,000 for the alteration, maintenance, and installation of the seacoast artillery, etc.; in all, $2,100,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask some one as to the status of the fortification of the canal, and whether that fortification has been entirely completed from the original plan, and if these are simply auxiliary assessments added to it, or whether the fortification is yet in a state of incompleteness?

Mr. BORLAND. I might say to the gentleman that the whole plan of the Board of Review has not been completed. This appropriation completes the emplacements for the 12-inch batteries, if he is familiar with that particular set of fortifications. Part of that money was appropriated in previous bills, and this completes them. And therefore during the present fiscal year we can probably add at least that much to the defense of the canal, because the 12-inch guns are ready and can be emplaced as soon as the emplacements are completed.

There are some other items which are projected for the defense of the canal which can not reasonably be expected to be completed under existing conditions, and those have not been entered upon, but we shall strengthen the defenses of the canal with the 12-inch batteries before the close of the year.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend that that is what I wanted to get at. I was fortunate enough once to be at the canal, but that was some years ago when the plans were perfected, and they were started then, and my question was whether they had been completed and whether this is just some additional equipment or whether this is a portion of the original plan.

Mr. BORLAND. This is in pursuance to the plan with which my friend is familiar, and we are strengthening it in this particular.

The Clerk read as follows:

For cantonment camp construction, including necessary buildings, water and sewer systems, roads, walks, etc., and for repairing and remodeling existing buildings to render them suitable for sheltering troops, $500,000: Provided, That the construction of buildings hereunder shall be performed under the direction of the Governor of the Panama Canal; in all, specifically for fortifications and armament thereof for the Panama Canal, $1,527,900.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be something in the RECORD to explain this item, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri, having it in charge, to just state the purpose of this appropriation of $500,000 for a cantonment at Panama, and by whom it is to be used.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, there are certain troops at Panama, and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] is fairly familiar with the number there. Those troops have been housed in temporary and makeshift quarters. All of them are fairly comfortably taken care of, except one regiment, the Porto Rican regiment, at Camp Otis, at Las Cascades. The testimony showed that that particular regiment, consisting of 1,955 men, was housed under very uncomfortable and perhaps insanitary conditions. A program was submitted for the barracks and quarters for the entire number of troops now on the Zone. That particular estimate was an alternative one. One estimate was submitted for cantonment construction and one for permanent construction, or a concrete building. The committee, after carefully considering the matter, concluded that now, when our policy was not to use any supplies or material or labor or transportation in these distant works of construction which would embarrass in any way the productive operations of the country in following its program for the supply of the Army in the field, was a very doubtful time to enter upon a general program of barracks-and-quarters construction in the Canal Zone, especially in view of the fact that labor is scarce and material is at the very peak in the point of price. The only pressing problem was this Porto Rican regiment, and after considering the matter we concluded that if we could provide for the Porto Rican regiment, the immediate emergency would be fully met. We therefore provided sufficient cantonment construction for this Porto Rican regiment. Whether it is actually used by that regiment or, with a proper rotation of the troops, by other regiments, it is entirely immaterial; but it relieves the situation of abolishing the untenable quarters at Camp Otis, at Las Cascades, and gives them additional quarters for at least one regiment. That is the explanation of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

BOARD OF ORDNANCE AND FORTIFICATION.

For all needful and proper purchases, experiments, and tests to ascertain, with a view to their utilization by the Government, the most effective guns, small arms, cartridges, projectiles, fuses, explosives, torpedoes, armor plates, and other implements and engines of war, and to purchase or cause to be manufactured, under authority of the Secretary of War, such guns, carriages, armor plates, and other war material as may, in the judgment of the board, be necessary in the proper discharge of the duty devolved upon it by the act approved September 22, 1888; salary of the civilian member of the board and for his necessary traveling expenses when traveling on duty as provided by the act of February 24, 1891; necessary expenses of the board, including rent of offices in the District of Columbia, at not exceeding $900 per annum, and a per diem allowance of $2.50 to each officer detailed to serve thereon, when employed on duty away from his permanent station; test of experimental guns, carriages, and other devices procured in accordance with the recommendation of the board, $50,000, the expenditure of which shall be made by the several bureaus of the War Department heretofore having jurisdiction of the same, or by the board itself, as the Secretary of War may direct: Provided, That before any money shall be expended in the construction or test of any gun, gun carriage, ammunition, or implements under the supervision of the said board, the board shall be satisfied, after due inquiry, that the Government of the United States has a lawful right to use the inventions involved in the construction of such gun, gun carriage, ammunition, or implements, or that the construction or test is made at the request of a person either having such lawful right or authorized to convey the same to the Government.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I wanted simply to say a few words in regard to Mr. Bannerman, who is said to be offering to sell some 6-inch guns for $15,000 each. I am not called upon in any sense to defend Mr. Bannerman. He does not live in my district, so far as I know, though he has property there. If you have ever been up the Hudson River by rail or by steamboat in the daytime, you will have noticed a castellated structure on an island about 6 miles above West Point, at the northern entrance to the Highlands, just where the river begins to broaden out into Newburgh Bay. That is Bannerman's "arsenal." He handles all sort of discarded ordnance, guns, and largely rifles, and things that he makes over to sell to military schools. He has written me several times about various things.

I find my memory was a little at fault as to his offer of guns to the Government, but he did offer a 6-inch gun for the armament of the American Line steamship St. Louis free of charge in February and March, 1917, together with some 50 shells to be used with it. The shells lacked some of the parts—fuses, and so forth—which he wanted me to obtain from the Government. He also offered a number of smaller guns. I wrote to the Navy Department in regard to the guns and ammunition, and the Navy Department replied. I unfortunately have not retained their letter. I forwarded that to him. But I recall that they replied that the guns were perfectly serviceable, but that they were not making ammunition that was applicable to them, and therefore they could not use them for arming ships and could not supply these parts. Apparently, according to the footnote in these hearings, he had all of those guns bought in 1913, perfectly serviceable. The gun he offered for the St. Louis was a 6-inch gun with a range of 6 miles, according to his statement. They were not exactly offered to the Government, but to the steamship company, but the Navy Department was communicated with about them and was considering the arming of merchant vessels.

It seems rather ridiculous to me that something that was offered practically free at that time should now come up in this way to be sold at such a price. I have no call to defend Mr. Bannerman at all. I have no doubt he is not seeking an extraordinary profit if the hearings on this bill state the facts, but it is a queer kind of business for one branch of the Government to sell something that is really useful and not to know that it could be serviceable to another branch of the military service. These guns, it appears, are not useful to the Navy, but they are useful to the Army. Why the Army could not have been communicated with in the first place, before the guns were sold, I do not know. It looks like lack of coordination, another instance of bad governmental management.

Mr. BORLAND. These guns were sold to Mr. Bannerman in 1913.

Mr. PLATT. I was at first under the impression that they were sold much later than that. I was under that impression when I questioned the gentleman some time ago.

Mr. BORLAND. The evidence shows that they were sold March 28, 1913. There was nothing, I suppose, at that time that would indicate to the officers of the Navy that they could be useful to the Army. That was a contingency that came up suddenly. I do not want to accuse Mr. Bannerman of any motive of profiteering. If he has an absence of that motive the way is now perfectly clear for him to deal with the Government on what we could all regard as fair terms. The deck has been cleared. There is no appropriation in this bill, and no estimate pending, and Mr. Bannerman can not sell the guns to any foreign country, and, of course, we are entirely willing to deal with him.

Mr. PLATT. I should think it came pretty nearly to profiteering at the price mentioned in the estimates, but the whole thing strikes me as ridiculous, the Government selling something almost at junk prices and then seeking to buy back at prices higher than the original cost.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman does not mean to say that we have deprived the War Department of the opportunity to procure the guns?

Mr. BORLAND. No. On the contrary, we have left the decks clear for the acquirement of the guns by the Government.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman mean to say that some of these guns were sold by the Government in 1914 after the war in Europe began?

Mr. BORLAND. No. The war began on August 1, 1914, and we entered it on April 6, 1917. These guns were sold a year and a half before the war began.

Mr. GOOD. Not all of them. Twelve of them were sold to Luria Bros., of Reading, Pa., in May, 1914.

Mr. BORLAND. That was before the war began.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to detain the committee just a moment in connection with the fortification bill. As the old Members of the House know, until this year I have had charge of this bill for a good many years past; and one of the things that I perhaps regretted most in connection with the coming to me of the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations was the necessity of turning over to other hands a bill that had been for many, many years to me a labor of great delight, as well as one, I hope, of some value to the country. But on the conclusion of this, perhaps the most important of all fortification bills, I am glad to say that the House has lost nothing by virtue of my ceasing to have charge of the bill, and I should be derelict in my sense of obligation if I did not express on the floor my appreciation of the work that the subcommittee have done in connection with this bill, under the very able leadership of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. [Applause.]

I have not entirely deserted this bill. Indeed, I have tried, along with my many other duties, to keep somewhat in touch with what has happened in the committee, and in connection with the marking of the bill in the subcommittee there were times when I undertook to have some part with the other gentlemen. I am glad to say that our views were always so nearly together that they were easily adjustable.

In the consideration of a bill involving the tremendous sums that this bill involves it is impossible to guarantee to the House or to the country that the moneys thus appropriated will always be expended just as we might wish. There are between 3,000 and 5,000 contracts or more which have been made by the War Department since this war broke. If a Member of Congress did nothing except to read the contracts, it would be impossible for him to keep up with them. I speak of that in order to emphasize again to the membership of the House and to the country the tremendous magnitude of the governmental activities at this time, and the unreasonableness of viewpoint of those who insist that Members of Congress shall be personally acquainted with and guarantee the expenditure that is made by all the departments in the prosecution of this war. To make the inquiries that would enable us always to check against any sort of unwise action would be to delay matters so much as to make our action the most unwise of all. Of necessity we must depend upon administrative officers. But the Committee on Appropriations have followed one policy, I think, consistently since this war broke. They have denied to the Government no moneys at any stage that were necessary in order to prosecute the war with the utmost vigor, and wherever there has been a question we have resolved that question in favor of the estimate in order that there should be no possible slowing up. On the other hand, the Committee on Appropriations have endeavored to vote no moneys to any department of the Government that were not needed within the time for which the appropriation was to be made.

We have tried to give to them ample moneys, and we have done so in each instance in order that they may go forward with the war; but where the estimates have covered a period of time away beyond the needs of the period appropriated for, we have so curtailed them as to give to the Congress and to the men asking for the moneys the added value of subsequent development in determining just what was needed and just what should be done with the moneys so asked. I believe I can say that policy will result in saving ultimately to this Government millions and millions of dollars, without in any way slowing up or delaying the activities of the Government in the procurement of those things that are necessary to press forward this war. There has been a looseness of estimate which, if it had occurred in normal times, could have had no possible excuse or justification. Much of it, I am compelled to believe, has not sufficient excuse now, and I am hoping that in the short session of Congress, when we shall be presented with estimates again, and when we shall be even more limited in time for the consideration of those estimates, they will come to us as the result of a more digested knowledge of the actual facts and the needs for which the money is asked than has always been true in the past.

I think it is due to the House and due to the country that they should understand what has been the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations touching these tremendous sums. That attitude has met with the approval of the House, practically without exception. The committee have given the best that they had in labor and in effort to serve the House and to serve the country, and I, as chairman of the committee, desire again to express my appreciation of the loyal service rendered by this and other subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12541) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BORLAND, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the following Members were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill: Mr. ROBBINS, Mr. RANDALL, Mr. SHERLEY, and Mr. GOOD.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I think the country ought to know that we passed the fortification bill at the rate of one and one-quarter billion dollars an hour—something like $18,000,000 per minute, which would be about $300,000 a second—an announcement that ought to reach Germany.

The SPEAKER. And the newspapers of the country.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES SUBJECT TO MILITARY SERVICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Federal Trade Commission in response to House resolution 374, of June 3, 1918, which was read, ordered printed, and for the present ordered to lie on the Speaker's table.

The statement is as follows:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, June 21, 1918.

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: By direction of the commission I am transmitting herewith, pursuant to a resolution of the House of Representatives of June 3, 1918 (H. Res. 374, 65th Cong., 1st sess., Representative MADDEN), a statement regarding the number of men in the service of the commission for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification were requested and allowed.

Respectfully,

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
L. L. BRACKEN, Secretary.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, June 21, 1918.

SPEAKER OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The following are the men, 14 in number, in the service of the Federal Trade Commission on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by this commission and allowed. The name, the home address, the character of work performed, and the length of time he has been in the service of the Federal Trade Commission are given in each instance:

Clarence H. Cardos, of Bronx, N. Y.; entered the Federal Trade Commission July 10, 1916; engaged on lumber investigation.

Wilson Compton, of Wooster, Wayne County, Ohio; entered the Federal Trade Commission July 1, 1916. Dr. Compton was allowed to resign from the commission in order to take up important work with the United States Shipping Board, Emergency Fleet Corporation. It is understood he will return to the commission when they can release him in order to again take charge of the commission's investigation on petroleum.

Wilfred Eldred, of Stanford University, Santa Clara County, Cal.; entered the Federal Trade Commission August 4, 1917; engaged on the grain-products investigation; to be given indefinite leave without pay to enter the military service.

Teasdale Fisher, of Cincinnati, Hamilton County, Ohio; entered the Federal Trade Commission service July 9, 1917; in charge of the commission's lumber-cost investigation.

R. A. Fouts, of Osborne, Osborne County, Kans.; entered the Federal Trade Commission December 8, 1917; engaged on the work of grain and produce exchanges; was allowed to resign on May 31, 1918.

James Marvin Haynes, of Cleburne, Johnson County, Tex.; entered the Federal Trade Commission service October 13, 1915; engaged on the coal investigation.

Carlos C. Houghton, of Washington, D. C.; entered the Bureau of Corporations (predecessor of Federal Trade Commission) January 16, 1914; engaged in economic supervision.

Arthur L. Lyddane, of Washington, D. C.; entered the Federal Trade Commission service October 11, 1909; engaged on the oil investigation.

Frank J. Scott, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; entered the Federal Trade Commission service October 27, 1917; in charge of the various investigations on the cost of food supplies for the military departments.

Donald D. Sells, of Chicago, Cook County, Ill.; entered the Federal Trade Commission service July 2, 1917; engaged on meat investigation.

Kemper Simpson, of Baltimore, Md.; entered the Federal Trade Commission service September 22, 1917; in charge of canned-goods investigation.

D. Paul Smelser, of New Windsor, Carroll County, Md.; entered Federal Trade Commission service July 1, 1916; was engaged on coal investigation; given indefinite leave without pay to enter the military service of the United States.

Harry A. Steinmetz, of Bronx, N. Y.; entered the Federal Trade Commission service July 16, 1917; engaged on the leather investigation.

Floyd L. Vaughan, of Madison, Dane County, Wis.; entered the Federal Trade Commission service July 2, 1917; engaged on grain and produce exchanges.

Very respectfully,

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
L. L. BRACKEN, Secretary.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BELL, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely, on account of death in the family.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee when he expects to bring up the conference report?

Mr. MOON. The papers are in the possession of the Senate. They have to act first. I do not know when they will act, and therefore I can not say when I will call it up.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 689).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment numbered 23 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 23: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amendment proposed by the Senate and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, $665,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to extend existing contracts for pneumatic-tube service until March 4, 1919, and the Postmaster General is directed to expend this appropriation for the sole purpose of continuing the existing pneumatic mail-tube service, and no part thereof shall be expended for the transportation of mails in any other manner than herein authorized:

"Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report to Congress not later than the 1st day of December, 1918, (1) whether or not the present pneumatic mail-tube service in the cities of New York, N. Y.; Brooklyn, N. Y.; Boston, Mass.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; and St. Louis, Mo., is a valuable and efficient postal facility, whether or not it expedites the delivery of first-class mail and should be retained or discontinued; (2) to investigate and report whether or not the present pneumatic-tube mail system is suited for the purpose of expediting the delivery of first-class mail, or whether tubes of a different kind or size should be employed; (3) if the said commission should recommend the retention of the present system, should the properties be purchased or leased by the Government and at what price and upon what terms; (4) if said commission should recommend a rental, as at present operated, what compensation should be paid therefor:

"Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall permit hearings to all parties at interest and the expense for such investigation shall be paid out of any available funds appropriated for the use of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

And the House agree to the same.

THOS. M. BELL,
HALVOR STEENERSON,
MARTIN B. MADDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. BANKHEAD,
THOS. W. HARDWICK,
CHAS. E. TOWNSEND,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

We do not concur in the above report.

JOHN A. MOON,
A. B. ROUSE,
Of the Managers on the part of the House.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 25, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (S. 2104) to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 686), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8625) to accept from the Southern Oregon Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Oregon, a reconveyance of the lands granted to the State of Oregon by the act approved March 3, 1869, entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from the navigable waters of Coos Bay to Roseburg, in said State," commonly known as the Coos Bay Wagon Road grant, to provide for the disposition of said lands, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 687), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FLOOD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 398) requesting the Secretary of State to furnish the House information regarding the diversion of water from Niagara River by the Province of Ontario, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 688), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ZIHLMAN: A bill (H. R. 12549) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to appoint a commission to investigate and report upon the available sources of water supply for the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. HULL of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 12550) for the appointment on the retired list, United States Army, of Brig. Gen. James Rush Lincoln; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RUCKER: A bill (H. R. 12551) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," approved June 25, 1910, amended by act approved August 19, 1911; to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

By Mr. SINNOTT: A bill (H. R. 12552) to authorize an appropriation not exceeding the sum of $1,000,000,000, or so much thereof as may be needed from time to time for the reclamation of arid lands, to provide farms for soldiers, Red Cross nurses, sailors, and marines; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

My Mr. DALE of Vermont: Resolution (H. Res. 400) to print extra copies of the soldiers and sailors' civil relief act for the use of the House; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. PETERS: Resolution (H. Res. 401) requesting the Board of Managers of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to report to the House of Representatives conditions at the soldiers' home in Virginia and the reasons for separation of Joseph S. Smith from the governorship; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DRANE: A bill (H. R. 12553) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Darlington; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MOORES of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 12554) granting an increase of pension to Mary Belle Chitwood; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RAKER: A bill (H. R. 12555) for the relief of the Yosemite Stone Co.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Miss RANKIN: A bill (H. R. 12556) granting a pension to Phineas Arthur White; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SCOTT of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 12557) for the relief of Sylvester Hannan, alias Henry Edwards; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BROWNING: Petitions of citizens of Almonesson and of Woodbury, N. J., urging nation-wide prohibition during the period of the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ESCH: Resolutions of the Iowa State Manufacturers' Association, concerning the production and transportation of essential products, also concerning the distribution of Government purchases with reference to the transportation problem; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. LEHLBACH: Petition of members of the Essex County (N. J.) Medical Society, urging the passage of House bill 9563; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STEENERSON: Petition of citizens of Marshall County, Minn., in favor of the repeal of the second-class postage provisions of the war-revenue act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SCULLY: Resolutions of the Iowa State Manufacturers' Association, relative to the production and transportation of industrial necessities, also with reference to the distribution of Government purchases as it affects the transportation problem; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. VARE: Memorial of the Pennsylvania Housing and Town Planning Association, asking Congress to increase appropriation for house building to the extent necessary to provide proper and sanitary dwellings for workers on Government war contracts; to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 25, 1918.

(Legislative day of Monday, June 24, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. JONES of Washington. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] on official business.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness. I wish also to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is detained by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION (S. DOC. NO. 247).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $1,000,000 required by the Interior Department for survey, investigation, and study looking to the reclamation of arid lands, cut-over timberlands, and swamp lands, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12541) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, requests a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, and Mr. MONDELL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 9160. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 9612. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 10027. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ASHURST presented petitions signed by Rev. William H. Fowle, pastor First Baptist Church, Mesa, Ariz.; Rev. F. W. Perkins, moderator Flagstaff Baptist Church, Flagstaff, Ariz.; Rev. E. L. Barkley, pastor Baptist Church, Winslow, Ariz.; Dean Hamilton, pastor First Baptist Church, Prescott, Ariz.; Rev. Richard S. Beal, pastor First Baptist Church, Tucson, Ariz.; Rev. T. M. Smith, pastor Baptist Church, Palo Verde, Ariz.; Rev. C. M. Northrup, pastor Glendale Baptist Church, Glendale, Ariz.; Rev. S. E. Newell, pastor Mount Calvary Baptist Church, Tucson, Ariz.; Rev. Samuel G. Bridges, pastor Baptist Church, Buckeye, Ariz.; Dr. John T. Taylor, moderator Baptist Church Middle Verde, Ariz.; Rev. P. S. Virgin, pastor First Baptist Church, Chloride, Ariz.; Rev. J. W. Johnson, pastor Baptist and Methodist Church, Somerton, Ariz.; Rev. William J. Gordon, pastor First Baptist Church, Nogales, Ariz.; Rev. J. Humphrey, Saint Paul Baptist Church, Bisbee, Ariz.; Rev. Cecil V. Overman, pastor Baptist Church, Clifton, Ariz.; Rev. C. M. Rock, pastor Calvary Baptist Church, Phoenix, Ariz.; Rev. R. P. Pope, pastor First Baptist Church, Scottsdale, Ariz.; Rev. George M. Lehigh, pastor First Baptist Church, Phoenix, Ariz.; urging and petitioning that no food nor fuel be permitted to be used in converting grains into alcoholic beverages, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 156) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the years 1919 and 1920, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 523) thereon.

Mr. STERLING, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations through the Bureau of Mines of lignite coals, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 524) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 4745) for the relief of the claimants of certain unsurveyed lands in Mississippi County, Ark.; and

A bill (S. 4746) to authorize the drainage of certain lands in the State of Arkansas, counties of Mississippi and Poinsett; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 4747) to amend section 11 of the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, as amended by the act of September 7, 1916; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. HARDWICK:

A bill (S. 4748) conferring jurisdiction on the District Court of the Canal Zone for the naturalization of certain aliens; to the Committee on Immigration.

A bill (S. 4749) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Mrs. Elizabeth Braddy, of Gibson, Glascock County, Ga., the sum of $601.75, the value of 145 war saving stamps which were destroyed by fire on the 26th day of May, 1918; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 4750) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by requiring the use of an automatic electric cab-signal and train-stopping device by common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 4751) granting an increase of pension to Albert F. Nelson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MARTIN:

A bill (S. 4752) permitting suits against the United States for damages caused by vessels owned or operated by the United States or by corporations controlled by it; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 4753) amendatory of the act of May 11, 1912, granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico; to the Committee on Pensions.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate of the bill (H. R. 12441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. GALLINGER conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 19th instant approved and signed the act (S. 4445) granting the consent of Congress to Marion and Horry Counties, S. C., to construct a bridge across Little Peedee River.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 12541. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senate was proceeding with the committee amendments to the bill at the time the recess was taken yesterday evening, and I ask that we proceed at the point where the Senate left off.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would the Senator accommodate me by recurring to the first amendment that was passed over during my absence yesterday relating to the equipment, maintenance, and training of foreign troops?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the one we are coming to now in regular order.

The SECRETARY. On page 65 the first amendment passed over is under the side head "Equipment, maintenance, and training of foreign troops," after line 6, to insert the following:

Equipment, maintenance, and training of foreign troops: Under such regulations as the President shall prescribe, contingents of troops from any country joined with the United States which during the existing emergency is or shall be at war with any country with which the United States is at war may, with the approval of the country from which they come, be equipped, maintained, and trained with our own troops, and at the end of such training may be transported with our troops to the European front and there equipped and maintained during service with our own troops against the common enemy; and the several items of expense involved in the equipment, maintenance, training, and transportation of such contingents may be paid from the respective appropriations herein made, or from any subsequent appropriations, for the equipment, maintenance, training, and transportation of the military forces.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Committee on Woman Suffrage has prepared a unanimous-consent agreement fixing a time for a vote upon the suffrage constitutional amendment, and if the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill now under consideration and others will give their consent, I should like at this time to have the agreement read to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not hear the request of the Senator from New Mexico.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He is trying to get a unanimous-consent agreement for a vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On this bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; on the woman-suffrage constitutional amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator is going to ask unanimous consent without any discussion, I have no objection; but if it leads to any discussion——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will lead to a call of the Senate, the Chair will state.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would rather proceed with this bill for a while.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course if the Senator from Oregon prefers that the matter shall go over for a while, I shall not object myself; but the purpose of the agreement is to fix a time for a vote, and it was not the intention at this time to enter into any discussion of the matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is very essential that this Army appropriation bill should be passed. The appropriations were exhausted on the 15th of June in many instances, and the War Department must have the money that is provided for in the bill. I hope the Senator from New Mexico will not insist on that until later in the day some time. We can probably reach a time in the afternoon when it can be taken up. I therefore insist that we shall proceed with this measure.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to have the agreement read at this time, so that Senators may be considering its purport, if there is no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator in charge of the proposed joint resolution that, so far as I am concerned, I am disposed to reach an agreement by unanimous consent—that is, I am perfectly willing that a vote shall be taken on the joint resolution at the proper time—but I would be unwilling to enter into an agreement by unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution so long as this war bill is pending, because if we reach an agreement of that kind and the war bill is pending it might have the effect to cut off all debate and all consideration of the proposed joint resolution. If the Senator expects to get a unanimous-consent agreement, I think it can be done at the proper time, but I hope that he will not attempt to ask for unanimous consent until he brings the joint resolution before the Senate. If he does, I give notice that he will force me to enter an objection.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Whatever is done will be satisfactory to all Senators. If the proposal which we now present is not satisfactory, we will try to make it satisfactory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not saying that the proposal is not entirely satisfactory at the proper time, but I do not think it should be made until the Senator brings the joint resolution before the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I request now that we recur to the amendment on page 65, line 23, of the bill, which was passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment is to insert from line 7 to line 22 what has been read by the Secretary. Is there any objection to that amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment passed over, beginning on line 23, page 65, will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 65, after line 22, the Committee on Military Affairs reports to insert:

Slavic Legion: That, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, a force of volunteer troops in such unit or units as he may direct may be raised to be composed of Slavs, Jugo-Slavs, Czecho-Slovenes, and Poles belonging to the oppressed races of the Austro-Hungarian or German Empire resident in the United States but not citizens thereof nor subject to the draft. Such force shall be known as the Slavic Legion or by such other description as the President may prescribe. No man shall be enlisted in it until he has furnished satisfactory evidence that he will faithfully and loyally serve the cause of the United States and that he desires to fight the Empire of which he and his race have been unwilling subjects. The force so raised and duly sworn into the service may be equipped, maintained, and trained with our own troops or separately as the President may direct and thereafter may be transported to such field of action as the President may direct to be used against the common enemy in connection with our own troops or with those of any nation associated with the United States in the present war; and the several items of expense involved in the equipment, maintenance, training, and transportation of such force may be paid from the respective appropriations herein made or from any subsequent appropriations for the same.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in the drafting of this amendment several mistakes were made, and I am offering some formal amendments to the amendment.

In line 26 I move that the first word, the word "Slavs," be omitted. That is desirable because the enumeration of the Slavic races will be sufficient without the use of the general term.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the first word in line 26, the word "Slavs," and the comma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, in line 26, I move to strike out the word "Slovenes" and insert the word "Slovaks." I find I was in error in using the term "Czecho-Slovenes." It should be "Czecho-Slovaks."

The SECRETARY. In line 26 strike out "Slovenes," after the word "Czecho," and insert the word "Slovaks."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I come to another amendment which I think should be inserted. I have not discussed the matter with the chairman of the committee, but I have been waited upon by an eminent Czecho-Slovak, Prof. Mazaryk, who suggests that the Ruthenians should be included, the Ruthenians being an oppressed race of Austria, akin to the Ukrainians of Russia—in fact, neighbors of theirs—and belonging to the same branch of the Slavic races. I therefore move that the word "Ruthenians," with "Ukrainians" in parentheses, be inserted after the word "Slovaks."

The SECRETARY. In line 26, after the word "and" and before the word "Poles," insert the words "Ruthenians (Ukrainians)."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator why he has not included in his amendment Russians?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For the reason that we are now dealing only with those who are technically alien enemies, who can not be enlisted in our Army under the present law because they are technically alien enemies, and the Russians do not fall within that class.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Russians are out of the war, so far as their de facto government is concerned. I scarcely know whether to class them as alien enemies or as friends or neutrals, but I am only suggesting the matter in order that it may get serious consideration. A great many of the Russians are of the same blood and race as the people who are mentioned in this amendment, with the same racial ambitions, traditions, and desires and the same interest in this war, and it seems to me that it would be a very congenial element to go into the make-up of such a legion as this. I assume that a great many of them are in the United States, and it would open up a great resource of men who might be added to the force of this organization.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has no objection to the amendment including Ruthenians?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the amendment be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. As proposed to be amended, the amendment would read:

That, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, a force of volunteer troops, in such unit or units as he may direct, may be raised, to be composed of Jugo-Slavs, Czecho-Slovaks, and Ruthenians (Ukrainians), and Poles belonging to the oppressed races—

And so forth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, after that amendment shall have been agreed to I have another amendment which I wish to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment still further, on page 65, line 26, by striking out the word "Poles." I offer this amendment not with any desire to exclude the Poles from this Slovak legion, but because it has been represented to me by those in charge of French interests in this country that it will probably result in some interference with the efforts they are making to raise a Polish legion, or, in fact, a Polish army, for active use in France. This movement has already gone so far that France, with the approval and cooperation of the United States Government, has taken over from our shores thousands of Poles; probably two-thirds of those secured for the Polish legion in France have come from the United States. Only a few days ago the Polish legion, which had heretofore passed under that name, received a new baptism, and under the name of "Polish Army" was decorated by the President of France in the field. Thus Poland was born again upon the battle fields of France.

I would not do anything in this measure to detract from the effort which France is making to enlist a great Polish Army to cooperate with the French Army, as has been proposed by France. I believe, therefore, it will conduce to harmony of effort and to unity of enterprise to omit from this Slovak legion the name "Poles." They can now fight in France under their own banner—under the silver eagle of Poland—and I am sure it would be unwise to attempt to divide their allegiance or to divide their interests by incorporating them in this Slovak legion. I therefore move, Mr. President, that the word "Poles" be omitted from the amendment as presented.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Possibly not directly upon the question of removing the Poles from this amendment, but upon the broader question, I should like some information from the Senator from Nebraska—that is, what is to be the status of these divisions after the war is over? They are at present to be made up of alien enemies. Of course, if they remain aliens and return to their own country, every one of them would be subject to be indicted and to be executed for treason against their own country. If they remain here, they ought to remain, of course, as American citizens. If we hold them during the war, we must necessarily protect them after the war. That seems to me to be one of the principal questions in this case; that is, the relation of this Government and its duty to protect these people against any law of their own country after the war is over. I assume that the Senator from Nebraska, of course, has considered that phase of the question, and I should like to have his views upon it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the question raised by the Senator from North Dakota is of some importance, but I have not given it much consideration. I assume, however, that if it were necessary the Government of the United States would protect those men in the treaties of peace that are finally entered into. Certainly we would owe them a heavy obligation if, without any legal obligation, they volunteered and risked their lives. I feel certain, however, that even without any protection from the Government of the United States the feeling of these Jugo-Slavs is so intense, they are so against the countries which have oppressed them and their relatives in the past, they will enter the war even though they know that upon capture they are to be shot. I have never found in my experience such intensity of patriotic feeling, such intensity of zeal, as is manifested in the conversation of these oppressed Slovak races concerning their aspirations for liberty. I believe they will esteem it a favor to be permitted to volunteer and to get the opportunity of service against the common enemy.

Mr. McCUMBER. Naturally, Mr. President, under the laws of nations and the laws of war, if any of them were taken prisoners they would be subject to be shot and undoubtedly would be immediately court-martialed and executed for the offense of treason against their own country. Therefore I was a little at a loss to know the sentiment that was back of this provision; whether it is a sentiment to free their own country, to fight as aliens to this country; whether it is a sentiment to assist this country; and whether the people of this blood intend at present to become American citizens or after this war is over. Of course, we could not take them in at present, but it would have a great bearing upon what our attitude should be and what provision we should make. If they were intending to become Americans, if they were intending to fight for America, then we ought to have some provision that would allow them to become American citizens or to declare their intention to become such, at least, and we ought to throw over them the protection of this Government, so that if any of them were taken prisoners we could apply the law of reprisal if they were executed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think there is much merit in what the Senator from North Dakota says; but I doubt whether what he suggests would really give to these men any actual protection if the authorities of Austria and Germany chose to disregard such an act of Congress. I should be very glad to cooperate with the Senator from North Dakota hereafter in giving to these men who had enlisted some privilege of naturalization if it could be made effective; but for the present the chief thing, it seems to me, is to avail ourselves of this man power which is in this country, and which is inspired with a tremendous zeal against our common enemy.

Then, Mr. President, there is another thing that I have omitted to say. It is not so much the man power which will be acquired by enlisting this Slovak legion that will prove effective; it is the tremendous moral effect of having the news spread throughout those countries which are inhabited by the Jugo-Slavs, the Croatians, the Slovenians, the Istrians, the Dalmatians, the Bosnians, the Herzogovinians, the Roumanians, and the Moravians that there is a Slovak army under the Stars and Stripes fighting upon the western front or upon any other front. The effect of that knowledge in those countries will do much, not only to keep alive the spirit of revolt, which is already burning fiercely there, but it will undoubtedly do a great deal to disintegrate the Austro-Hungarian Empire and to weaken it in the present struggle.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that after the word "subjects," in line 9, page 66, we add the words "and the allies thereof," so that the oath required by the law will be that the subject "desires to fight the empire of which he and his race have been unwilling subjects and the allies thereof."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; that would be entirely acceptable to me; but the present amendment relates to the Poles.

Mr. THOMAS. May I move the amendment which I have suggested?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is an amendment pending now to strike out the word "Poles." That might be submitted first, and then the Senator's amendment could be offered.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. I have not the text of the amendment before me. Can the Senator give the page?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Pages 65 and 66.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is it proposed to organize this legion as a part of the military forces of the United States, or is it to be an independent force?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is left in the control of the President.

Mr. HARDWICK. We do not know, then, whether this legion will be a part of the military forces of the United States or not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are to be treated as a part of the military forces. The language used in the latter part of the amendment is as follows:

> The force so raised and duly sworn into the service may be equipped, maintained, and trained with our own troops or separated, as the President may direct, and thereafter may be transported to such field of action as the President may direct, to be used against the common enemy in connection with our own troops or with those of any nation associated with the United States in the present war.

Mr. HARDWICK. That would be true about all the American forces, and that, I think, is a necessary discretion to give the Commander in Chief in relation to all military forces; but, after all, these people will be a part of the military forces of the United States, will they not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think so.

Mr. HARDWICK. If that is so—the Senator spoke of their naturalization just now—there is already provision made for their naturalization.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That occurred to me while I was on my feet after the Senator from North Dakota had asked the question. The pending amendment is to strike out the word "Poles."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 65, line 26, in the amendment reported by the committee, before the word "belonging," it is proposed to strike out the word "Poles."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. It occurs to me that if these Poles are not enlisted under the authority of the United States they will not have the immunity of ordinary prisoners of war if they are captured. Is it not a dangerous thing to leave them "outside the breastworks," and not treat them as soldiers of the United States Army? I submit that question to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator will realize that the answer to his question is that those Poles who have enlisted already in the foreign legion of France have the protection of France to as great an extent as they could have the protection of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly, I agree with the Senator that the Poles who have enlisted under the colors of France are certainly protected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. But the Poles embraced in this amendment, unless they are brought under our protection, or under that of France, are left up in the air and will not have the immunity of prisoners of war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am moving to strike out the word "Poles" from this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the word "unwilling" found in the amendment on line 9, page 66. The sentence reads:

No man shall be enlisted in it until he has furnished satisfactory evidence that he will faithfully and loyally serve the cause of the United States and that he desires to fight the Empire of which he and his race have been unwilling subjects.

It seems to me that the word "unwilling" there is a little out of place. It may have reference to time. When were they "unwilling subjects"? Were they "unwilling subjects" at the time they left their native country or were they up to that time willing subjects of that country?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is merely descriptive matter and would not control the military authorities in drafting the affidavit which a man would make. It is merely a description in the law to guide the military authorities.

Mr. STERLING. Well, it seems to me that it is either a question of proof that he is an unwilling subject or else we are assuming that he was an unwilling subject at the time he left his native country and came to the United States. It seems to me that the word "unwilling" there is wholly unnecessary; that if he is a subject and if he has complied with other requisites here and makes affidavit accordingly, that he will "faithfully and loyally serve the cause of the United States and that he desires to fight the empire of which he and his race have been subjects," that that is all that should be required, and we need not refer to the matter as to whether or not in the past he has been an unwilling subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was not intended, Mr. President, that the man should assert that he had been an "unwilling subject." It is merely a description to guide the military authorities. It is a matter, however, of historical notoriety that all of these races have been unwilling subjects of these empires. The Senator will hardly question that the Poles, the Bohemians, the Moravians, the Croatians, the Slovenians, the Istrians, the Dalmatians, the Bosnians, and the Herzegovinians have all been unwilling subjects of the German and Austro-Hungarian Empires. I have used the word merely as a description. It is not of great importance, and I think it could be left out.

Mr. STERLING. We have understood, as a general proposition, that they have been unwilling subjects; but I do not think that warrants us in writing it here in the statute that they are unwilling subjects or that they have been unwilling subjects. It is enough to say that they have been subjects of these countries.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I rather think there is some advantage in the word, because the very theory of this legislation is for us to violate the ordinary custom, which does not contemplate the use of an alien enemy, and enlist a man who is technically an alien enemy, the only theory and the only excuse for using him being that he and his race have been unwilling subjects; that they are a subject race to the Austro-Hungarian Empire. I think the Senator will gain nothing by striking out that word.

Mr. STERLING. It occurs to me that the word "unwilling" is of no use, and I move to strike it out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 66, line 9, before the word "subjects," it is proposed to strike out the word "unwilling."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word in answer to a suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

It did not seem to me that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] made the matter as plain as it ought to be made, that under the language of this amendment these people, no matter what they were, will become soldiers of the United States if this legislation passes and they enlist in accordance with its provisions. The language of the provision is:

That under such regulations as the President may prescribe, a force of volunteer troops in such unit or units as he may direct may be raised to be composed of Slavs. * * * Such force shall be known as the Slavic Legion or by such other description as the President may prescribe. No man shall be enlisted in it until he has furnished satisfactory evidence that he will faithfully and loyally serve the cause of the United States—

And so forth.

I have no doubt myself that the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota is eminently proper; that the legal status of these people ought not to be left up in the air; and that the United States Government ought not to be in any position where there could be any doubt about its rights to claim and assert for these people the fullest protection that we can assert or secure or enforce—and "enforce" is a better word, probably—for any of these soldiers. But my own judgment is that it can. I understand the language means that these men are to be soldiers of the United States, however they are employed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HARDWICK. And if that is true, by reprisal, if necessary, or by any other military methods that can accomplish that purpose, we can give to them exactly the same protection, no more and no less, that we can to any other soldier who wears our uniform and serves under our flag.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Colorado, I move to amend the amendment by inserting on line 9, page 66, after the word "subjects," the words "and the allies thereof."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "subjects" it is proposed to insert a colon and the words "and the allies thereof."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the proposed amendment, the following proviso:

Provided, That American citizens of Austrian or German birth who have passed the necessary examination and whose loyalty is unquestioned may, in the discretion of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, be commissioned in the United States Army or Navy.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer this amendment so as to have the Senate go on record on the question of commissioning in the Army and Navy of the United States men who are of alien-enemy birth, but whose loyalty is unquestioned. There has been a suggestion of late that men of this type should not be commissioned. I know of some men who have been told that they could not have commissions because they were born in Austria or Germany. The committee amendment to which this amendment is offered proposes to permit the creation of a division in the American Army of men who are under our laws alien enemies. My amendment simply seeks to provide that men born in alien-enemy countries but of American citizenship and qualified in every other respect, in the discretion of the President may be commissioned in the Army. To deny these men the right to be officers because of alien birth and then insist that they shall be subject to the draft and serve as private soldiers is, to say the least, very un-American.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment, and I believe that no man on the Military Affairs Committee has any objection to the commissioning of officers who are of the same birth as those men included in the paragraph who have demonstrated that they are thoroughgoing Americans, have been naturalized, and have passed through the officers' camp.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, is there any question but that they may be appointed now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, that brings up a rather remarkable ruling of the War Department. A few days ago, when the Senate Military Affairs Committee was in session, a woman fairly burst into the room to tell the chairman of the committee the case of her son. He had gone through one of the officers' camps, stood third from the top in excellence, was highly recommended by his local officers, but because he had been born in Hungary, under the Austrian flag, he was denied a commission; and others are in the same class. We have denied commissions to Armenians because they were born under the Turkish flag, although they hate Turkey. We have denied commissions to men who are technically Austrians although they hate Austria. The plea that the woman made before our committee impressed every member of it that the War Department was making a great mistake in excluding from officers' commissions those well-educated young Slavs in this country who have gone through college, who have gone through the officers' camps, and who are eminently qualified to become officers, simply because they were technically born under the flag of one of our enemies.

I therefore approve the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this is a mere ruling by the department, is it not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is a mere ruling.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is no law that justifies it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. None whatever.

Mr. McCUMBER. And if we add this to the law, it has no more than a merely suggestive application?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is about all.

Mr. McCUMBER. It does not change the law in any way?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that it may be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The Secretary again stated the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the amendment offered by my colleague, at least in its spirit; but, as I understand, his purpose in offering it at this time is to secure an expression of opinion from the Senate upon this question. I notice, however, that his amendment is confined in its operations to men who were born in Austria or Germany. I ask if he would not be willing to broaden that provision, and make the amendment operative over men who were born in what is now alien enemy territory?

I have in mind the case of a young man who was born in Syria. Every one knows that Syrians despise the Turks; that they have been brutalized and oppressed by them for centuries. He came to this country at a very early age, when he was a mere infant, went through our school system, and graduated at a university. He then went to an officers' training camp, graduated from our own officers' training camp, and was about to receive his commission, when he was told: "No; you can not have it, because you were born in Syria." I was wondering if my colleague would not enlarge the jurisdiction, as it were?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am certainly willing to accept that suggestion.

The SECRETARY. After the words "of Austrian or German birth" it is proposed to insert the words "or who were born in alien enemy territory."

Mr. CALDER. I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 78, beginning with line 19, it is proposed to strike out that line and all down to and including line 24, on that page, and insert:

Importation of certain war materials free of duty: That during the present emergency upon request made by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Treasury, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, there may be imported into the United States without payment of duty thereon raw materials, parts or partly fabricated parts of equipment, and finished equipment required to hasten or facilitate the production of munitions or machinery of war whenever such duty would otherwise be payable directly or indirectly from appropriations for the support of the Army.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not believe that the Senate will approve this amendment. It means that manufacturers who already have contracts with the Government based upon paying duty upon the goods imported which enter into the goods made to fill those contracts shall be relieved of the amount of duty paid upon such importations. As far as the Treasury of the United States is concerned, it would be like taking the money from one pocket and putting it into the other; but, as far as the manufacturer is concerned, he having bid upon goods imported with the duty added, it would be a gain of whatever the duty would amount to.

I want to call attention, Mr. President, to the fact that at the close of business on June 22 this year, the amount of customs collected is $174,777,345.73, as against an amount on the same date for last year of $220,241,560.54, or a loss to the Treasury of the United States in round numbers of $46,500,000. It is not possible that the Senate is going to adopt at this time an amendment that will relieve manufacturers and importers of paying duty on material that enters into the construction of machinery or munitions of war or war materials of any sort, when it would not in any way benefit the Treasury, but would simply mean that there would be just so many dollars given to all the manufacturers who have at the present time contracts with the Government for furnishing goods at a fixed price.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am inclined to agree with the Senator. It seems to me it is absolutely certain that the one immediate and direct effect of the adoption of this amendment would be to permit those who have already contracted with the Government to buy their materials at a very much less price. It would be virtually legislating into the pockets of these gentlemen who have contracts with the Government already the difference brought about by the import duty; and, so far as I am concerned, I am going to vote against this amendment. It was not called to my attention in this way before the committee, and I believe it ought to be defeated. I think the Senator's motion to strike it out is proper.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Utah, who is so much more familiar than myself with the rules concerning revenue legislation if he has given consideration to the question as to whether or not we could originate this legislation? This is a repeal of a tariff law and it is not on a revenue bill. This bill does not pretend to deal with the revenues. There is nothing about the tariff in the bill; and I will ask whether the Senator has considered that question?

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that the committee of the Senate no doubt took jurisdiction and included this amendment in the bill, because there was a House provision on the same subject applying only to the Ordnance Department, and the Senate committee has enlarged that so as to cover all departments; so I think, under that provision, perhaps they had jurisdiction. I will say, however, that it seems to me that simply to state the case is enough to defeat the provision. Two years ago, I think, the same provision was asked for by one or two of the departments, and at that time it was put in one of the appropriation bills, and it was stricken from the bill. Last year the same provision was put in one of the bills—I forget which one—but when the attention of the Senate was called to it, it went out of the bill immediately; and I have no doubt that this ought to go out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he does not think also that the House provision ought to be struck out?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Senate ought to disagree to the committee amendment, and then strike out the House provision.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I take it, in answer to the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the House, having legislated on this very subject, it was perfectly pertinent for the Senate committee to offer the amendment. I hope the amendment will be defeated, and I hope the chairman will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in view of the action of the committee, I do not feel that I can accept the suggestion. The matter was discussed at considerable length in the committee, and this is the result of the committee's action. I can see objections to the provision and there is force in the suggestions made by the Senator from Utah. On the other hand, members of the committee took the view that it was simply taking money out of one of the Government's pockets and putting it into the other; in other words, that it was just about as broad as it was long to admit free of duty these raw materials that go into the manufacture of munitions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to say that that would be true in so far as future contracts are concerned, but as to contracts already existing it would have an entirely different effect. Instead of taking money from one pocket and putting it into the other, it would be legislating a lot of money into the contractors' hands.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am inclined to believe that the serious objection to the provision is the one raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania. It is revenue legislation in a sense, and ought to originate in the House; but if it is stricken from the bill, in view of the fact that the House bill had a provision on the subject, we could take up the whole matter in conference and consider it there. I am not going to oppose the motion very seriously.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, that disposes of the affirmative amendment on page 79.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, the House provision would remain in the bill. I therefore move to strike from the bill lines 19 to 24, on page 78.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 78 it is proposed to strike out lines 19 to 24, inclusive, in the following words:

Provided further, That all material purchased under the appropriations for the Ordnance Department in this act shall be of American manufacture, except in cases when, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, it is to the manifest interest of the United States to make purchases abroad, which material shall be admitted free of duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question before we take up the next one of the committee amendments that were passed over.

I ask the Senator having the bill in charge to turn to page 89. Under the provision for printing and binding there is the following proviso:

That printing, binding, and blank books required for use outside of the District of Columbia in connection with the support of the Army and the National Guard may be done or procured elsewhere than at the Government Printing Office when in the opinion of the Secretary of War such work can be more advantageously done or procured locally—

And so forth. I should like to ask the Senator if any real good reason was given why that provision should be put in the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator will remember that two years ago, I think it was, possibly when the last appropriation bill was up, it was physically impossible for the officers at the cantonments to get printing done in time to distribute it among the soldiers and give them the information which it was necessary for them to have. The red tape that had to be gone through and the difficulty of getting printing done here in Washington led some officers in the National Guard to have the printing done at their own expense, in order that they might get the material prepared.

Mr. WARREN. I think they made a perfect case, and the provision was necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. I think so, too, and that is why two years ago it was allowed to be put in the bill. I simply want at this time to say that as soon as the war is over I think a provision of this kind ought never to appear in the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am in thorough accord with the Senator. I think it is a bad plan as a general rule; but in view of the rapidity with which these men have to be raised and gotten into the cantonments and the amount of literature it was necessary to place in their hands the committee was led to act favorably at this time, and also when the last appropriation bill was up.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to an amendment in line 20, page 90. Yesterday afternoon I had an amendment made inserting the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary" after "$316,941." I have looked at the RECORD, on page 8192, and I find that the amendment was not agreed to finally. I now offer it again, as the RECORD does not show that it was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was agreed to. The Journal so shows. We do not go by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Journal shows that it was agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is entirely satisfactory, if the Journal shows it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 100, after line 15, the Committee on Military Affairs reported to insert the following:

CHAPTER IX.

Army Mine Planter Service: That hereafter there shall be in the Coast Artillery Corps of the Regular Army a service to be known as the Army Mine Planter Service, which shall consist, for each mine planter in the service of the United States, of 1 master, 1 first mate, 1 second mate, 1 chief engineer, and 1 assistant engineer, who shall be warrant officers appointed by and holding their offices at the discretion of the Secretary of War, and 2 oilers, 4 firemen, 4 deck hands, 1 cook, 1 steward, and 1 assistant steward, who shall be appointed from enlisted men of the Coast Artillery Corps under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That the Coast Artillery Corps is hereby increased by such numbers of warrant officers and enlisted men as may be necessary to constitute the force provided by this chapter: Provided further, That the annual pay of the warrant officers and enlisted men in the various grades established by this chapter shall be as follows: Masters, $1,800; first mates, $1,320; second mates, $972; chief engineers, $1,700; assistant engineers, $1,200; oilers, $432; firemen, $396; deck hands, $216; cooks, $360; steward, $540; assistant stewards, $288: And provided further, That warrant officers shall have such allowances as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and shall be retired, and shall receive longevity pay, as now provided by law for officers of the Army, and that the enlisted force herein provided for shall receive the allowances and continuous-service pay now provided by law for enlisted men of the Army: And provided further, That in computing length of service for retirement, and in computing longevity pay for warrant officers and continuous-service pay for the enlisted men authorized by this chapter, service on boats in the service of the Quartermaster Department or the Quartermaster Corps prior to the passage of this act shall be counted: And provided further, That during the continuation of the present emergency all enlisted men of the Mine Planter Service of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $15 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $12 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $33, $36, or $40, an increase of $8 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $6 per month: And provided further, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee something about that amendment, and to call his attention to some facts that have been brought to my attention in connection with it. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if the objections of the mine planters to this provision were considered by the committee?

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I will state that I was appointed on a subcommittee with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and we heard all the objections filed by all the men who are now in operation of the mine-planter outfit. We had a proper hearing of both sides of the matter, and we were led to the conclusion, and recommended, that the amendment should be adopted as it is set out here, and the committee also recommended it. We heard all the objections of the mine planters which were presented.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me ask the Senator this question: Under the terms of this bill the master, for instance, of one of these mine planters gets $1,800?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. These masters are now getting $2,800.

Mr. KIRBY. That is true.

Mr. JONES of Washington. How does the committee justify a reduction of that kind under the present condition of things?

Mr. KIRBY. These mine planters are not now in the military service of the Government. They are civilians. They strike, or insist upon this sort of a wage or that sort of a wage, and they say it is only reasonable under present conditions; but we are told by the department here that it is necessary to put them within the service of the military department, so that we can rely upon these people who will be officers and men in the service. Then we can keep them in the service under any emergency and at all times, and this is enough money, under existing conditions, to secure all the talent that is needed to operate the mine-planter service. That is the condition as it was developed before the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course I can understand why the Army wants these mine planters in the service; but this compensation was fixed by the Secretary of War, and if it was reasonable at the time when he fixed it it seems to me that some arrangement ought to be made under which the compensation of these men would not be subjected to such an extreme reduction, at any rate. These people, many of them, have their families; they have to take care of them, and they are just able to do it upon the compensation they are now receiving. To make such an enormous reduction as this would be very unjust and very unfair. The general plan is to increase compensation now rather than to decrease it, and yet here you are decreasing the salary, for instance, of a master $900.

Mr. KIRBY. We are not expecting these men, if the salary is not satisfactory, to stay in the service. The department desires men who will be in the military service who can be designated to perform this particular duty, and who will be there when required to be there.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the Senator think that we need these experienced men? I wish to say, in justice to these men, that they say they will not leave the service. I will just read a statement from one of them.

Mr. KIRBY. I have no objection to the Senator reading it, but we had all those statements before us.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to read it for the RECORD. Here is what one of them says:

Mr. Senator, should we be penalized for working for Uncle Sam, which we will be should this bill go into effect as we can not resign, and will not during this emergency, no matter what happens? Commercial companies do not ask such a sacrifice, and why should the United States Government?

These men do not propose to leave the service if we cut their wages much lower; but it does seem to me to be a very great injustice. We provide here that the mates shall get $1,320. These mates are getting now $2,280. Their pay is to be cut to that extent. Second mates are to get $972. They are getting $1,680 now. That was the compensation fixed by the Secretary of War for this service.

I want to say that these are men of experience. Many of them have been in the service for a great many years. We do not want in this emergency to take new men and displace these old ones, even if the department contemplated getting their services. We do not want to do that.

As I have read from the letter they do not propose to leave, but we ought not to take advantage of that circumstance to cut their wage as we seem to be doing here. They are going to have to do just the same class of service, work in the same danger, and with the same energy they have been doing heretofore. Their work during this war has been much more arduous than it ever has been before, much more dangerous than it was when this compensation was fixed. Here we give the chief engineer $1,700. He is getting now $2,500. We cut his pay $800. Here are the assistant engineers, whom we put at $1,200. They are now getting $2,100. In other words, we cut their compensation $900 by this measure. Then we give oilers $432, and they are now getting $1,320. In other words, we reduce the salary of these men $900.

Mr. REED. What section of the bill is that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Chapter IX, page 101.

Mr. WARREN. I can explain it to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I am trying to find out. I want to find out why we are treating these men in this sort of way.

Then firemen, according to this bill, get $396. They are now getting $1,260. That is their compensation. Then deckhands under this bill get $216, and they are now getting $1,140. Why make such an enormous reduction as that? What is the reason for it? Is it possible that when a man enters the service of Uncle Sam and does the same kind of work that he has been doing all the time he has got to give up so much of his salary and compensation, and under this bill get $360 where he now gets $1,080; in other words, a reduction of over $700? Cooks, under this bill, get $360. They are now getting $1,080; in other words, a reduction of over $700. Then stewards, under the bill, get $540, where they are now getting $1,200.

Mr. STERLING. In what service?

Mr. JONES of Washington. In the mine planters' service. Assistant stewards are to get $288, and they are now getting $900.

Now, I want to show how we treat them in the Navy:

> These warrants are not even commission warrants, as provided in the Navy, and in no sense of the word do they equal the Navy rate except in the higher grade; the lowest commissioned warrant officers in the Navy receive as a salary a pay of $1,500 per year.

Then why should not these men, at any rate, if they are going to be taken into the Army, have the same sort of treatment we accord men in the Navy?

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] suggests to me that no enlisted men in the Army get what they do in the Navy. I am not familiar enough with the technical terms to know just the difference, but I take it from this letter that in the Navy they have men in similar positions, and they are getting $1,500 per annum, or much greater than that proposed here.

Mr. KIRBY. If the Senator addresses his inquiry to me, I think——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am addressing it to anyone who will answer it.

Mr. KIRBY. The whole matter was presented to the committee. These men are in civil employment. They can leave when they get ready. They are not subject to the order of the Government at all, any further than that they are employed. It was deemed necessary and desirable to have them in the Government service, so that they can be relied upon. Men are being trained for this service and the salaries are regarded as sufficient by the War Department. They will have no trouble, they think, in getting the kind of talent they need for the discharge of this sort of duty at this figure.

It seems to me that there should come a time when the Government ought to get something at its reasonable worth. It is time, when we are asking everybody in the world to subscribe to liberty bonds and saving stamps, that we should not expend more money than ought to be expended for this particular service. The Judge Advocate General, who was getting $15,000 or $20,000 before he went into the service, gets $2,500. Take a man in the Medical Department. He was making $25,000 a year, probably, before he entered the service, and he gets $2,000 under the commission he has taken here. If we can get the service—and the War Department says we can get the service—I do not see why we should allow anybody else to control the establishment and organization of this service except the War Department, which must be responsible for it. We reached a conclusion after hearing both sides and all the objections that have been presented here, and we reported it to the committee and the committee recommended it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I agree with many of the suggestions of the Senator from Arkansas, but if we are going to reduce pay we should reduce it, and let us not stop with a certain class. This, I think, is the only class whose pay we have been reducing. We have been increasing salaries generally, and we should have some other reason given for this reduction than that given by the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. On page 101, starting with line 13, it reads:

> That warrant officers shall have such allowances as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and shall be retired, and shall receive longevity pay, as now provided by law for officers of the Army, and that the enlisted force herein provided for shall receive the allowances and continuous-service pay now provided by law for enlisted men of the Army: And provided further, That in computing length of service for retirement, and in computing longevity pay for warrant officers and continuous-service pay for the enlisted men authorized by this chapter, service on boats in the service of the Quartermaster Department or the Quartermaster Corps prior to the passage of this act shall be counted: And provided further, That during the continuation of the present emergency all enlisted men of the Mine Planter Service of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $15 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $12 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $33, $36, or $40, an increase of $8 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $6 per month: And provided further, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

These men need not enter the service, but if they enter the service they know that they will have all the allowances of clothing, shelter, food, and retired pay after they have been in the service long enough for retirement. They will have also increased pay from time to time for long service. So, while they commence at low pay, finally they arrive at a high pay, considering all their allowances.

These enlisted men are very different from the men who are hired from day to day or month to month as civilian employees.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator would have us understand, then, that the committee considered those things as full compensation for this reduction, or, rather, as I understand, that the committee think it is best to take these mine planters into the Army and make their crews and officers enlisted soldiers and place them upon a par with all other soldiers?

Mr. WARREN. Exactly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And if these people do not want to stay in at the compensation provided, of course they can go out. Of course, if the committee thinks that is wise, I really have nothing to say. These men, I take it, are speaking of this proposition on the basis that they are expected to continue in the service. They have been in this service for a great many years. While it is true they are civil employees, I suppose they are under the control of the War Department. As a matter of fact, the Government, as I understand it, has three mine layers, and these men are employed by the War Department and their compensation was fixed by the War Department.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I have been detained in committee work, and I have not heard all this discussion, but may I ask the Senator how the present salary or wage was fixed? Was it by salary or by the War Department?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand it was fixed by the War Department several years ago. I think the statement that I read is to that effect.

Mr. POMERENE. In any event, Congress has not fixed it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not think Congress has fixed the pay. This man who writes to me says:

> Myself being a second mate at present, with a yearly wage of $1,764, it is proposed under this bill to cut it to $972 per year, or to $81 per month. As I am now getting $147, it will mean a cut of $59 a month, which is a very unfair cut.
> Out of this pay I must purchase food and uniform and maintain my family.

Apparently they are required to have a certain kind of uniform.

Mr. KIRBY. They do not buy that after they go into the service.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This man ought to know whether he has to have a uniform. He has been doing this service for a good while, and he said he had to purchase a uniform.

Mr. KIRBY. I will suggest that there are different conditions about the food and uniforms after they get into the Government service.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that men in the Army are furnished with uniforms if they are privates, but if they are officers they are not furnished them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The committee was very much impressed by the argument the Senator has made, but we received a communication from the War Department and found that under the provisions of this bill the salaries or wages to be paid to these men, taken together with their clothing allowances and their mess allowances or their food, are just about the same as what they have been getting in cash, as described by that writer. Since we have received that information, and I think some members of the committee stated what was the intention of the War Department, we received no further complaint.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This letter is dated March 10, but I received another one about two weeks ago.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it is due to a misunderstanding.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I wanted to bring out—if these people do not understand the situation, that they might be advised of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The War Department furnished us a table showing a list of those employees, what they are receiving in civil life as mine planters, and what they would receive in money value under the terms of this bill, and they were practically alike.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why should not that statement be put in the RECORD?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will obtain it and have it put in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of Washington. When the chairman of the committee obtains his statement, I ask permission that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that will explain the situation so that these people will understand it, and that was my only purpose. I thought the committee must have some good reason for putting this matter in the shape that they have done. I can appreciate that, if this service is to be brought into the military department, it must be brought in, of course, upon the general basis of military action. I have no doubt but that these men will patriotically remain in the service and perform these duties, at least until this war is over; but the committee seems to think it would be wise, if they should not be disposed to do that, to replace them with others. So I am satisfied that this statement, together with the facts which are in the RECORD, will explain the matter so that those people will understand it. I shall not further detain the Senate, nor shall I propose any amendment to the committee amendment.

The statement referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF COAST ARTILLERY,
Washington, May 6, 1918.

MEMORANDUM FOR MAJ. GEN. E. M. WEAVER.

In compliance with your request, I am inclosing a table showing past, present, and proposed pay for members of mine-planter crews. The table also shows the rates of pay for warrant officers and petty officers performing the same work.

(a) Column 10 shows the Army grade getting the same pay as that proposed (column 8).

(b) Column 11 shows the Navy grade corresponding to master, chief engineer, etc.

(c) Under columns 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6 you will notice headings "Old" and "New." The old pay was in effect until quite recently and was that upon which the proposed pay was based.

(d) Note that pay on Ringgold and Armistead is higher and always has been higher than on the other planters. This is due, I understand, to the fact that the wages for civilian crews on the Pacific coast are higher than on the Atlantic.

(e) Note the comparative low pay of ship's officers on the Hunt and Knox.

These vessels are in Manila.

(f) Note that the proposed pay, with allowances of a second lieutenant (column 12), is a substantial increase over the old pay and over pay for corresponding work in the Navy (column 9).

(g) In comparing with the Navy pay, I have included only two warrant officer grades, namely, that of boatswain and machinist, corresponding to master and chief engineer. For first mate, second mate, and assistant engineer I have made a comparison with the Navy petty officer grades of chief boatswain's mate and chief machinist's mate, since the Navy Department informed me that on vessels the size of mine planters, doing their class of work and normally working around the harbors, those would be the Navy grades assigned. If comparison is desired throughout for Navy warrant officers, the pay is the same for all grades.

Officers in the Naval Reserve Force on listed ships that are naval auxiliaries are enrolled as follows for vessels of 500 tons (gross) (planter class): Ensign (second lieutenant), corresponding to master; machinist, corresponding to chief engineer; boatswain, corresponding to first officer. This differs somewhat from the statement made above, but is due to the fact that the Naval Reserve vessels are not confined to harbors as much as mine planters.

In the above I have endeavored to give the latest pay received, although it is possible by this time that the crew of the Frank has had another increase, as while I was in the office of the Quartermaster General getting this data a telegram was received from the commanding officer of the Frank making such a request.

With reference to the inclosures with Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S letter, I submit the following comment:

Mr. Trahey's letter: 1. He refers to the Knox and Hunt sailing for the Philippine Islands and the Ringgold and Armistead sailing for San Francisco.

These trips were unusual and some of the crew were specially detailed to make the voyages.

2. He refers to the planter making annual trips to Honolulu.

Whenever the planters make a voyage to the Hawaiian Islands they are convoyed by one of our transports, and in the case of the Armistead's voyage this spring, she was towed part way and convoyed the remainder.

3. In connection with the question of the second mate having to stand a watch and comparing his pay with the pay of an officer in the Navy doing the same duty, the Navy informed me that on similar vessels in their service only the master and chief engineer, as I stated above, would be warrant officers, but that on vessels which went to sea and had to stand watches, they would have the other two deck officers warranted.

Watch duty on a mine planter is very light.

Joint letter from the Ringgold's officers: 1. It is stated that warrant officers' base pay ranges from $1,500 to $2,250 per year.

In this connection I am inclosing a table (Table B) showing warrant officers' pay. You will note that the pay referred to above is that of a warrant officer on sea duty ranging from his first duty to that after 12 or more years. Moreover, the warrant officer in the Navy gets no allowances for quarters except when getting shore pay, when the monthly allowance is two rooms at $12 each. Shore base pay is $1,125 (see Table B). This would make his pay, with allowances, $1,413, or $87 less than I have shown in the tables for comparison.

You will note I have considered chiefly the pay of the warrant officers. In connection with pay of the other members of the crew it is noted there will be quite a reduction. This was fully considered at the time and the proposed rates were made, because it appeared to be unjust to pay a steward more than a first sergeant, or a cook more than a quartermaster sergeant. For further comparison, it should be noted that the pay of a master electrician, the highest-paid enlisted specialist in the Coast Artillery Corps, is $1,188 per year.

In the above I have not included the additional war pay for grades below second mate and assistant engineer, since this increase is the same for both Army and Navy.

To be just to the members of the mine-planter crews, I believe that all men who do not desire to work under the provisions of the bill should be allowed to resign when the bill is passed, and this without prejudice, the men being allowed to accept positions in the Naval Reserve, under the Shipping Board, or where they may desire.

A course in navigation is now being started at the Coast Artillery School, Fort Monroe, and we expect to fill all positions very shortly with qualified men.

C. W. BAIRD,
Major, Coast Artillery Corps.

SEATTLE, WASH., April 22, 1918.

United States Senator CHAMBERLAIN,
Chairman of the Senate Military Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned officers of the United States Army mine planter Major Samuel Ringgold, wish to call your attention to, and to protest against, the ratification of the Army mine planter bill, as passed by the House of Representatives on April 8, 1918.

We are basing our protest on the grounds that the bill in its present form is not a fair bill to the men now employed in this service. The greatest objection being the matter of salary offered, which is far below that now in force for these vessels and others of the same class, namely, all ocean vessels navigating the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and below the pay of warrant officers of the United States Navy, where warrant officers' pay ranges from $1,500 to $2,250 per year as base pay, while that offered in the bill is from $972 to $1,800 per year.

Attached to this communication is a scale of wages in force on the Pacific coast to merchant officers and the Army transports and to officers of the Shipping Board vessels, also an official copy of the wage scale to vessels of the mine planter service here.

It is proposed to pay the master of these mine planters less than what is paid to masters of small gas-propelled launches of the Coast Artillery Corps. At the coast defenses of Puget Sound the master of the distribution-box launch L–35 receives a salary of more than $1,800 per year, as do the masters of the 60-foot harbor boats Lieut. Gurney and Capt. Anton Springer. The harbor boats Major Evan Thomas and the General Mifflin pay as salary to the master $240 per month. These vessels are much smaller vessels than the mine planters. Does it stand to reason that the crew of an ocean-going vessel should receive less remuneration than these small harbor vessels?

After reading in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the passage of H. R. 9898 and noting the remarks of the several Members on the bill, it is evident that the welfare of the men who operate and navigate the vessels was not considered at all, as there was no opposition or word of protest offered on the floor of the House.

In creating a new branch of the Army, as it is proposed by this bill, and which is to be a permanent arm, is it not to the best interests of the Government to create something that will attract the mariners of proven capability and keep in the service the present members who thoroughly understand all the requirements of mine planting, this planting being an art that takes years to acquire the proper skill and ability to handle a mine planter in the mine fields?

There have been many opportunities for better positions with the Navy Department, Shipping Board, and merchant fleets, yet very few have left their vessels in expectation of some satisfactory legislation being enacted that would be beneficial both to themselves and the War Department, but this present bill is not considered so. We do not believe even yet that it is the intention of the War Department to underpay its employees and to class us as of no value as compared with other vessels' crews in its harbor service. So it is our intention to get these facts before your committee before a vote is taken in the Senate. We hope that the Senate will give more consideration to our claims than was the case in the House of Representatives.

Consider, for example, the case of the first and second mates and the assistant engineer: The first mate is to receive $1,320; the second mate, $972; and the assistant engineer, $1,200 per year; a comparison with the present wage we are now getting will show why this letter has been written. Mates and engineers on small tugs that operate wholly in bays and harbors receive from $125 to $175; and a copy of ocean-tug salaries is also attached to this letter. These schedules and statements can be verified by inquiry at any steamship office or agency.

It was stated in the House that these ocean vessels never went to sea, but hung around harbors, and would not out if it was too dark or rough. In view of the over-seas voyages that these vessels have made in the past this contention will not stand. The mine planters Knox and Hunt both steamed across the Atlantic to the Philippine Islands by way of the Suez Canal; the Armistead and Ringgold both steamed around to the Pacific coast from the Atlantic coast by way of the Straits of Magellan; and every year the Armistead and Ringgold have alternated making a trip across the Pacific to Honolulu, the Armistead making the trip the present year, having left here in March and being in Honolulu at the present time, the Ringgold doing the planting at the Columbia River bar this year. On the Atlantic coast there are five planters that make trips on the Atlantic seaboard from Maine to the Panama Canal. So, in view of these facts, this work can hardly be likened to harbor work, and mine planters must be considered as ocean vessels in every sense of the word, and manned by ocean navigators, and can not be confused with harbor boats, which are manned and officered by strictly harbor men, whose license will not permit them to leave certain restricted inland waters. A copy of the requirements for officers of the mine-planting service is inclosed. Where can a man with such ability be secured for $972 per year, or $81 per month, out of which must come food and uniform?

Is it the intention of the War Department to rate these planters as in a lower class than even its smallest harbor boats?

In this letter we are telling what we know to be the truth, and the wage schedules attached are those in operation at the present time on the Pacific coast. We believe that we have a just cause or there would be no protest against this measure.

It is also evident from the conversation that took place at the time this bill was passed by the House that the Members were not very well informed regarding marine conditions, and it does not seem possible that this bill was thoroughly investigated before passage, possibly on account of many pressing and more urgent bills to come before that body. We are urging that your committee make a thorough investigation of this bill or, if not having time at present, to delay it until such investigation has been made.

The United States Navy considers the men of this service as valuable officers, as several who have offered their services have all been accepted and given commissions ranging from ensign to lieutenant commander. These men entered the Navy early in the war, but that is not possible at present, as the Quartermaster General does not look with favor upon officers of the Army service resigning their positions for commissions in the Navy, who demand a release from the Army before accepting as members of one of these vessels. These releases are not given; and attached to this correspondence will be found two copies of correspondence. One refers to the advisability of allowing mine-planter officers to resign and the other as to the penalty for leaving the Army service.

In view of these statements, what chance have we to accept outside positions if the War Department chooses to enforce these rulings, should any of us tender our resignations, which, under this bill many of us will be forced to do, for the reason that it will be next to impossible to support our families on the salary offered, especially the lower officers.

Every one of us wish to remain where we are at present, if possible, and have no reason for leaving under present conditions, and it is not yet too late to make this an attractive proposition by rectifying the objectionable features of this bill.

The Military Committee knows from legislation discussed in the Senate for the betterment of conditions for naval officers—and this includes warrant officers of the Navy—what the base pay of warrants in the Navy is, and a comparison of that base pay and that proposed for our branch will show a great reduction for us.

In closing we wish to state that we do not believe that after full investigation the Senate will approve this bill as it now stands, and we earnestly urge a readjustment of the base-pay scale.

Sincerely, yours,

[Extract from letter No. 231, S 322, Hq. West. Dept., Aug. 3-17.]

Those drawing less than $1,200 per annum receive 10 per cent additional.

Those drawing between $1,200 and $1,800 receive 5 per cent additional.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN subsequently said: Mr. President, again referring to the suggestion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] about the comparative pay of the men who are engaged in the Army Mine Planter Service, the amounts received by them before the passage of this proposed law and the amounts to be received under it, I now have that information, and I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD directly after the remarks of the Senator from Washington, so that it may be all together.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the matter will be inserted in the RECORD at the place indicated. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over was, on page 102, Chapter X, amending the Articles of War.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment was passed over at the instance of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have examined the language contained in that amendment, and I think it is reasonably safe as it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over was, Chapter XI, beginning on page 106, in line 5, "Method of determining quotas for military service."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from California desires to address himself to that amendment, and I do not see him in the Chamber just at the moment. I therefore ask that the amendment be passed over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over was, Chapter XVI, which is found on page 117, "Aircraft Production Corporation."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this provision was adopted, as indeed the entire bill was passed upon, while the subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee in charge of the investigation of the aircraft situation was absent from the city upon the business of making that investigation. I wish to say now that I do not think the bill ought to have been reported by the committee while members of the committee were absent on the business which they were charged by the committee to conduct. I say that, not for the purpose of making complaint, but I certainly do not want to be charged with any part of the responsibility as a member of the committee when the bill is passed upon in that way.

I desire to call particular attention to Chapter XVI, which relates to the Aircraft Production Corporation. I think that at least that part of this bill ought to be referred to the subcommittee for their examination. We have spent over two weeks in investigating the aircraft situation. Speaking for myself, I am not content to grant the powers provided for in Chapter XVI unless I shall have some explanation of what is proposed. I know of nothing that has been done by Mr. Ryan that warrants me in concluding that we ought to give him the authority provided in Chapter XVI.

I have tried to reach the chairman of the subcommittee this morning, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], in order that there might be some consultation among the Senators who have been particularly engaged in this business; but up to this moment we have not been able to have any kind of meeting. I should like to have this matter lie over until there can be a consultation, if it is not going to delay the bill. If it is going to delay the bill, I am going to ask to have this amendment rejected.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, the committee would not have any objection to the amendment going over for a reasonable length of time in order that the Senator may advise himself fully about it. I suppose the Senator could do that some time during the day?

Mr. REED. I think we could get together and have a talk about it. I have been looking around the Chamber for the Senator from Colorado, but he has been called out.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, if that can be done, the committee is perfectly willing to let the amendment go over for a while.

In reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, Mr. President, that the bill ought not to be acted upon in the absence of some members of the committee, I will say that the subcommittee had this bill under consideration for nearly three weeks, and at the time when the five members of the subcommittee on aircraft production were here the doors were always open for any of the members of the committee who wanted to be present. There was no desire at all to be discourteous to members of the subcommittee, for they are doing splendid work in investigating the situation of aircraft production. However, the War Department was so insistent and the needs of the country were so great just at this crisis that the committee did not wait for the return of the subcommittee in order to take the matter up. I hope Senators will not think that there is any purpose to be discourteous at all to those Senators.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, the chairman of the committee could not be discourteous; it is not in his nature. I realize the fact that this is a day of haste; that everything gives way to haste. I only think that there might have been a delay long enough for the full membership to have arrived and have voted; but I will make no complaint about that. I know that no discourtesy was intended; but I ask that this matter be laid over until the subcommittee on aircraft production may consult about it. I do not know whether they will feel like making any suggestions or not, but the subject of aircraft was committed to their care—not the subject of this legislation—and the subcommittee has given very earnest work to it. If the amendment can go over during the afternoon, I will try to see if I can get the subcommittee together.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does that request require unanimous consent, Mr. President?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, indeed.

Mr. REED. I think it does not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it does require unanimous consent, I object.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not object. It is a very reasonable request which the Senator from Missouri makes—that the matter go over for a while this afternoon, until the subcommittee on aircraft can look into it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does it require unanimous consent, Mr. President? If it does, I object.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think it does require unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think it requires unanimous consent. The Senate can pass over a provision of this kind. I was with the committee when the provision was considered, and regretted that the other members of the subcommittee on aircraft were not also present. I sought to investigate it so far as I could, and the subcommittee, consisting of myself, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], was appointed to consider this particular amendment. Still, although I agreed to it—and a further study of the amendment has made me more strongly for it than I was when it was considered by the committee—I join in the expression of the hope that the Senate will permit this provision to go over until to-morrow. I think it is due the other four members of the subcommittee on aircraft that they should have an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if this request involves unanimous consent, I object. If it does not, of course I can not help it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In view of the objection, of course the Senate will have to determine the matter. The question raised is, Shall the item be passed over temporarily?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it has been usual here for the chairman of the committee to join in such a request; I never knew it to be opposed; but I do not think it requires unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submitted the question; but, in view of the objection, the Senate should be required to determine the matter. The question is, Shall the item be passed over temporarily? [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it, and the item will be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments, except the two passed over, to wit, Chapter XI and Chapter XVI.

Mr. FALL and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico rose first and is recognized.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I understand amendments are now in order to the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Amendments are now in order from the floor.

Mr. FALL. On yesterday afternoon I offered an amendment, but in view of the fact that the bill was then about to be laid over I simply requested that the amendment be printed and taken up in due course. I now offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 120, after line 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That the age limit fixed in said act is hereby changed and shall be and is hereby fixed at 18 and 45 years in lieu of 21 and 31: Provided further, That those registered under the age of 21 shall not be drafted nor used for service upon the firing line until they shall have reached the age of 21.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think this is a tremendously important proposition, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKellar	Shields
Baird	Harding	McNary	Simmons
Bankhead	Hardwick	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Henderson	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Calder	Hitchcock	New	Smoot
Chamberlain	Hollis	Norris	Sterling
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Sutherland
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Swanson
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Thomas
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Thompson
Fall	Kellogg	Poindexter	Tillman
Fernald	Kendrick	Pomerene	Trammell
France	Kenyon	Ransdell	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	King	Reed	Wadsworth
Gallinger	Knox	Robinson	Walsh
Gore	Lenroot	Shafroth	Watson
Gronna	Lodge	Sheppard	Williams
Guion	McCumber	Sherman	Wolcott

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is detained on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is detained on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico a question.

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I note that the maximum age limit that the Senator places in his amendment is 45. I want to ask him if he would have any objection to making that 55?

Mr. FALL. Personally I have no objection at all to making it 58, which would cover my own age by about a year.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the Senator have any objection to making it 41?

Mr. FALL. I do not care to accept the amendment to make it 41, because despite the objections which I know exist in this body and among a great many of the citizens of the United States to either increasing or decreasing, and particularly decreasing, the age limits, in my personal judgment the age limits now existing under the laws must be both decreased and increased before we win this war. We are going to face it sooner or later, and we realize now some of the difficulties which we have incurred in the past by virtue of not being fully prepared for contingencies as they arise. There is nothing compulsory in this amendment except that the age limits would be decreased and increased, and the compulsory feature of the proviso that the President shall not put upon the firing line any of the boys under 21 years of age.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FALL. I yielded to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. I simply want to ask a question. The amendment proposed by the Senator involves two propositions, one of lowering the age limit and the other of increasing it. Would there be any objection to having those propositions voted upon separately? I am in favor of one proposition, but I am opposed to the other, and I think many Senators are in the same position.

Mr. FALL. Of course, even if I were to object the proposition is possibly divisible. I think it is possible that the Senator would have a right to divide the question. I will say very frankly, Mr. President, that in so far as I am concerned personally, to the best of my judgment, the last proviso is one which should not be adopted. In other words, I believe that, as has been the case in all other wars, it is going to be necessary for us to take the boys from 18 and men up to 45 years of age before we conclude this war. That has been the history of our country in every other war, and in my judgment it will be now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FALL. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to make a few remarks. Am I recognized?

Mr. FALL. The Senator asks recognition to make a few remarks. I will yield the floor in a very short time, as my remarks will not be extended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator, of course, can reassume the floor whenever he pleases. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has not yielded the floor except for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask to be recognized for a few minutes.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I can not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico declines to yield. That ends the matter.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I shall not extend my remarks to any great length. The amendment speaks for itself.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FALL. I yield for a question.

Mr. PENROSE. I will ask the Senator from New Mexico whether, up to to-day, the War Department made any recommendation on this proposition?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the War Department certainly has made none to me, and I have no knowledge of its having made any to the Senate or to the Congress.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not know whether the department had made some suggestion to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FALL. I am not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. President, and I can not speak for the committee. This amendment is one drawn not even in concert with my colleagues in the Senate, but simply expressing my own view.

Mr. President, of course there is objection to decreasing the age limit. The fact remains, however, that practically a million men of the forces now under arms in the United States are in the service under the provision of the law providing that they may enlist from 18 to 45. I have reference to the Regular Army, to the National Guard, and to the marines and sailors of the United States. Of course, these are volunteers. This would simply extend the draft provisions to the same ages.

Mr. President, the provision that the boys under 21 years of age shall not be placed upon the firing line is one which I have said I personally do not favor. The history of our former wars shows that they were won by boys under 23, and that the majority of the soldiers who fought in the Civil War were under 21. Under the provisions of the draft act as it is the law now, the President has the power not only to exempt certain classes, but to summon into the semimilitary service each of the men or classes whom he exempts, if in his judgment he desires to do so.

He has not availed himself of that power or authority vested in him now by the law. I desire to read the provision, or at least a line of it:

The President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes—

Enumerating them. The enumeration of the classes whom the President may exempt is also the enumeration of the classes whom he may call into the semimilitary service. Therefore, to-day every man in the United States who is not drafted for purely military service, every man between the ages of 21 and 31, is subject, in my judgment, under the provisions of the law as it is now, to draft for semimilitary purposes. What those semimilitary purposes are must be discovered by any legislative conclusion upon that subject as drafted into law or by the Judge Advocate General, I presume, or those who are called upon to enforce the provisions of the draft law.

So far as the legislative opinion upon the subject has been expressed in the various bills which have passed this body from time to time practically every business in the United States has become, by legislative expression, a war necessity, or at least a semimilitary duty, so that without any attempt to stretch the powers directly conferred upon the President of the United States by the draft act itself, in my judgment he now has the authority to draft into the semimilitary service for farm employment or for any other employment connected with the war or with the creation of a military necessity all those whom he may exempt between the ages of 21 and 31.

There are, of course, many men over the age of 31 who have no dependents whomsoever upon them. It is much more just to take these men into the service for purely military service now than it is to go into a second class and take those between the ages of 21 and 31 who to-day have dependent wives or dependent children or dependent families.

This, it seems to me, is a matter of justice which speaks for itself. There is no reason whatsoever why the President should not have the power to go into the class between 31 and 45 and to take from that class for military service those who have not dependent families rather than that he should be compelled—as he will be compelled, I understand—in increasing the armed forces under the draft act, to go into the second, third, or fourth classifications and take those in actually necessary employments or those with dependents upon them.

The only question meriting discussion, as it appears to me, is the question of decreasing or lowering the age limits. As I have said, in our past history we have started at 18, always. To repeat myself, with reference to practically a million men now in the military service we have started at the age of 18. It is true that it is a hardship upon the mothers to take from them their boys between 18 and 21. It is true, of course, that some of these boys will be taken from their schools if this provision is adopted. Nevertheless, Mr. President, the country is going to be compelled, in my judgment, notwithstanding the good news that we have had in the past two days, to use all its manhood to win this war. We are face to face with the proposition and we might as well settle it. If in the President's discretion he sees fit not to draw the boys from 18 to 21, or if he sees fit to classify them into the third, fourth, or fifth classes, or any other class which he may designate, he has the power to do so. He is not compelled to draft them, to take them away from their farms or their schools or their mothers or their families. He is simply authorized to do so. There is not a direction in this entire bill, in the original draft bill, or in the present bill. There is nothing compelling the President to do anything whatsoever. Authority is simply vested in him, in his discretion, to do certain things in the event he desires to avail himself of such authority.

As I have said, I have very little to say on the subject, Mr. President. I hope the amendment, as drawn and offered, will be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, so far as the boys who are 20 years old are concerned, I have no quarrel with this amendment, because they can receive one year's training before they go into actual service, and at the end of one year's training they will be better fitted to serve the United States Government than any of the troops we now have; but, so far as I can learn by sizing it up, with our population each additional year involves a million men going to the front. I am therefore going to move to reduce the maximum of this requirement from 40 to 35 years. That will give us 3,000,000 more soldiers, most of whom will have no home dependents, and most of whom will cost the United States Government nothing except for themselves.

I offer, Mr. President, an amendment reducing the age limit from 45 to 40.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 3 of the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico it is proposed to strike out "45" and insert "40."

Mr. WILLIAMS. That gives us nine more years, or something like 9,000,000 more of men.

Now, Mr. President, speaking for myself and the class and the age to which I belong, we can not do very much. I see the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] down there below me. He can not do much, and I also can not do very much, except in the words of a recent poem that has come back to me from France, "Helping Bill to win the war." "Bill" is an impersonal character. He is my boy; he is the boy of the Senator from Utah; he is the boy of the Senator from Minnesota; he is the boy of the Senator from New Hampshire; he is my boy. His name is Bill, in general terms. Of course, all we can do is to pay and praise, and praise some more and then pay some more, and see the boys through.

Mr. President, men between 40 and 45 generally are the men whose domestic relations have been fixed. It will cost the United States a great amount of money, under the allowance and the allotment and the insurance legislation which we have passed, to make these people fight for the United States. If we raise the 31-year limit to 35 years, which is my motion, we bring in 4,000,000 more men.

Now, in regard to these 19-year-old boys, when you say that a 19-year-old boy has got to be trained for two years before he can even go into the Army, that is foolishness; so I move to put that age at 20. That will give a boy 12 months to be trained for military service.

That is enough if he has any brains at all or is a real American boy; he can be trained in 12 months for any service anywhere on the surface of the earth. If he can not be, he is not a real American boy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Can we have the amendment read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 2 of the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico strike out "18" and insert "20," and in line 3 strike out "45" and insert "40," so that it will read:

That the age limit fixed in said act is hereby changed and shall be, and is hereby, fixed at 20 and 40 years in lieu of 21 and 31.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the Senator, the original amendment was to strike out 45 and insert 35, but did not include in that striking out 21 or 18 and inserting 20; and that is not a part of the amendment, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be but one amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Chair holds that that is a part of the amendment, then I demand a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

Mr. NORRIS. Personally, I am in favor of the amendment as far as it fixes the age at 45 as a maximum, but I am not in favor of the amendment when it provides for taking boys who are 18 years of age instead of 21. If I had my way about it, I would increase it to more than 45. The proviso, of course, takes away a good deal of the harm of fixing the age at 18, because it provides that they can not be used in actual service until they have become 21. While I would favor an amendment striking out 18 and inserting 20, and if it is not moved by some one else I expect to move it, I do not want to mix the two amendments together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to separate the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I think we should have a separate vote on each branch.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Nebraska to say that he is in favor of reducing the age limit from 21 to 20?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I stated just the opposite. I am opposed to reducing the age limit, but I am in favor of increasing the maximum over 31. If I had my way about it, I would make it 60.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In that statement the Senator expresses my own thoughts and desires. I would rather see the minimum limit fixed at 20 than 18, but I prefer 21 to either.

Mr. NORRIS. So would I, and I am going to favor that kind of amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am satisfied with 21. I shall vote against any change of the present law fixing the minimum or lower age limit. In the first place, I shall not vote to conscript a man for service at the front who has not reached 21 years of age. That is, I shall not do it at this time. From 18 to 21 years of age is the formative period in a man's life. During those years he lays the foundation of a life's work—builds the substratum upon which character is erected. He is not consulted about the laws of the country; he is not permitted to go to the polls and settle with his Congressman for the blessings or the damage that that Congressman by his vote may have imposed upon him, and since he is not permitted to participate in the affairs of his Government I shall never vote to compel him to render service such as is contemplated in this amendment. There are enough older men who under the draft system can be selected—men capable of rendering efficient service in the Army, who have had their "swing around the circle"—and if they happen to be killed they have not lost as much as a boy who has had no chance at all.

I shall not take by conscription the mother's boy; I shall not break the ties that bind to a mother's heart this child who to her is yet a child until he reaches the age of maturity or manhood. This, Mr. President, is sentimental, it may be said, but the world is controlled by sentiment, and not even the armies, the cannon, the shot, and the shell will contribute more to winning this war than sentiment.

There is another reason why these boys should not be taken as proposed under this amendment. They are needed on the farm and in the industrial pursuits of life. Many of them are the stay and support of the home, and if they are taken and put in training it will materially, I fear, reduce the yield of the farms and the products of the factory which are needed to support our armies, our women and children at home, and our allies abroad. The man above 31 years who will be taken under this draft will not have the home ties and responsibilities which usually devolve upon a boy, especially among the middle or laboring class of people between the years of 18 and 21.

I repeat, Mr. President, I have no objection to raising the age limit to 40, 45, 50, or 60, if necessary in order to raise an army which will overcome our enemy across the waters, but I can not, I will not, vote to reduce the age limit below 21, and I sincerely, from the depths of my heart, trust that the amendment may be disagreed to.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this increasing of the age limit to 55 and 60 looks to me like providing an asylum for home guard. The best men we had in the Civil War, and the Civil War was fought by men of that age, were boys who enlisted when they were 18 and 19 years, very many of them 17. Three-fourths of the Army who fought the Civil War on the part of the North were boys 18 and 19 years old, and they make by all odds the best soldiers.

If Senators want an effective Army that can render efficient service, that can stand the test of warfare, they will take the basis from 18 to 35 or 45, I do not care which. I think ordinarily when a man has passed 40 he does not make a very good and effective soldier. There may be some part of the work he may be able to do.

I have been getting in these recent times a lot of letters from men who say, "I want to do my bit for this war. I am anxious to get in. Can you not find me a place at Washington in some of the departments, or can you not get me a commission?" One man wrote me, "If you only will extend the age limit to 60 years, I might get into the Army." To my mind, for effective military service, after a man has passed 40 years, or at the utmost 45 years, he is of little or no value to stand the stress of a campaign.

Now, let us not be fooled by any maudlin sympathy in this matter. We are at war and at war with a powerful enemy, and we shall need an army, and we want the best kind of an army. If we extend the limit from 18 to 45 a greater opportunity is given to the Government to grant exemptions in industrial lines to those of the older age. Is not a man when he is 35 or 40 a good hand to work on a farm? Can he not stand farming much better than military service? A man might work in a factory, where they work only 8 hours a day, instead of working in the trenches 24 hours a day in rain and flood and mud and everything else.

If you want to carry on this war successfully, why resort to any maudlin sympathy? Make the age limit from 18 to 45, or 35 if you please. If you want good soldiers, take the young men. They are the most effective.

As to this story about taking young men out of school, Mr. President, it was my lot to serve in the Army as an enlisted man, a private, and a noncommissioned officer, and I regard my Army service as the best part of my education. I feel confident I would never have gotten along as well in the world as I did if I had not gotten my diploma as a noncommissioned officer in the Fourth Wisconsin Regiment of the Union Army during the war.

Let our boys go into the Army. It gives them a training, a discipline, which they can get nowhere else. If you want to carry on this war successfully do not let this maudlin sympathy about keeping the boys on the farm and in school restrain you from giving us the best material we need for an effective Army.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. Before the Senator proceeds, will he yield to me for just a moment to suggest a correction in the phraseology of my amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. FALL. On line 5 of the printed amendment, after the word "drafted," the words "nor used" should be stricken out, so that it will read "shall not be drafted for service upon the firing line."

The words "nor used" might be construed to prevent boys from being registered or volunteering for service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator from Oregon proceeds, with his permission I should like to ask for an explanation as to the idea the Senator from New Mexico intends to convey by the use of the term "drafted." You reduce the age, and I suppose that is the age subject to the draft, from 21 to 18. Do you provide that those registered under the age of 21 shall not be drafted? If it means anything it means that they can not be called even into training, because you can not train men until you draft them. It would seem to me, if the Senator wishes to make it convey the meaning that they shall not be used upon the firing line until they have reached the age of 21, it would be far better to strike out the words "drafted nor," so that it would read:

That those registered under the age of 21 shall not be used for service upon the firing line until they shall have reached the age of 21.

That it gives the Government the right to bring them in and train them and prepare to put them upon the firing line.

I am not agreeing, Mr. President, that we should exempt them even from the firing line. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that the boys from 18 to 21 will make the very best soldiers. But the point I want to make is that if you include the words "shall not be drafted" it means you can not even call them into the service, and in that respect you are not changing the law from what it was before.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Oregon has the floor, but the Senator from North Dakota has asked me a question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I suggest to the Senator that for the purpose of perfecting this language I have just asked that the words "nor used" be stricken out, so that it will read "shall not be drafted for service upon the firing line." They may be drafted for any other purpose whatever, but not for service upon the firing line.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Oregon will yield to me, I want to say that that provision is an insult to the boys. It is an insult to tell them "we will make baby soldiers of you; keep you at home for parading and drilling, and we will not let you do any real fighting." On behalf of the young men who have patriotism and want to fight I protest against that provision.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senate knows very well that the provisions which are now in the draft law as to age were compromise provisions. The Senate and the House had come to an impasse in reference to the age, and we fixed the ages between 21 and 30 after a good deal of discussion and after conference.

Mr. President, I am in thorough sympathy with the view of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I believe with him that the age limit ought to be fixed between 18 and 45, because aside from the sentiment which is involved there is no reason in the world why young men between 18 and 21 should not be called upon to serve their country.

I think the records of the Civil War will show that most of the Army on both sides was composed of young men under 21 years of age, and not only between 18 and 21, but they went in from 13 and upward. I know in the neighborhood where I lived young men did not dare to stay at home beyond the age of 16, because if they did they were practically ostracised from the society of all good people. So the Army on both sides was composed of young men between 14 and 21.

But feeling as I do about it, we have got to meet a situation. This war can not be waged, Mr. President, unless we have the sentiment of the country behind us, and I am satisfied from what I have seen that the country will not stand for the drafting of young men into the active service under 21.

The matter has been more discussed within the past year than it ever was discussed before the American people in times past, and I believe, favoring universal military training, as I have at all times, if we put the minimum at 20, to be trained until they are 21, and then raise the age limit to 45, to be classified after they have registered, we will have done a great deal and will have put upon the statute books a statute which may possibly find advocates in the House as well as in the Senate.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator make that as a motion or a suggestion?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not the power to accept it on behalf of the committee, but it is an amendment of first impression. As far as this bill is concerned, I am only stating my views as an individual.

Mr. FALL. In drawing the amendment I have only stated my views as an individual. Of course, I do not seek to have them carried out in opposition to the wishes of the majority, and I defer in these matters to the chairman of the committee, who is so constantly at work in trying to shape our affairs for this war. So far as I am concerned, I certainly would not insist upon my personal views as opposed to his, and I would be inclined to accept a suggestion to strike out "18" and put "20" in lieu.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will be glad to see that done, and I will give the measure my support. In view of the fact that the committee has not acted upon the subject at all, I feel at liberty to exercise my own personal preference in the matter.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. KIRBY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yeild; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Excuse me for a moment. I believe there will be some chance to get the House to agree to that amendment, but I am sure that the House would never consent to a reduction of the age to 18. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Is there any reason, from the standpoint of man power, why we should reduce the age below 21 now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would say yes, for this reason: Even if the age is reduced to 20, we will have a trained army of men who will reach 21; while, as it is now, we have to take them for training, and it takes from six months to a year to train them.

Mr. POMERENE. As I understand it, we have over 10,000,000 men since the last registration—probably 11,000,000 men—between 21 and 31, and of that class there have been only about a million and a half called to the colors. What is the need of reducing the age below the present limit?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. For this reason, Mr. President: If the Senator will examine the testimony of Gen. Crowder before our committee, he will find there is a reason for changing the age limit. I do not care to state it here now, but unless we do change the age limit we will find ourselves in other classes than class 1 pretty soon, and that interrupts the whole of the social fabric, both of industrial and commercial life. When we get out of class 1 we go into the class of young men who have families—young men who are established, young men who have dependents—and it is better, from my viewpoint, to step over the line of 30 and take the man who loafs around the barroom, if you please, and the billiard parlor, and has no dependents. We might just as well take such a man as a young man between 21 and 30.

Mr. POMERENE. I can understand why there might be a necessity for raising the age limit; I qualify that—not a necessity, but perhaps it might be the part of good policy to do it—but the reason which would suggest the raising of the age limit does not appeal to me when it comes to the lowering of the age limit.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have stated to the Senator my personal view as to those between 18 and 21. I do not believe Congress will pass a law that will reduce the age to 18. Yet we need not deceive ourselves about what the enemy knows. The enemy knows our military situation just as well as we do, if not better than many of us do. America ought to go to work, and she will have to go to work before this war is over and serve notice on the world that every man in this country, even if under 18, America stands ready to put to be trained, if not put to the front, for the protection not only of our own country but of civilization as well.

In the present emergency and as the conditions are to-day we do not need to go down to 18, but we ought to go down to 20, so that the young men may be classified and put into military training and come out of it at the age of 21, when they may be called for service prepared to fight the battles of the country instead of taking them into cantonments and then training them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. For information only. I believe in reducing the age to 18. I will say that in the beginning. But my question is, Whether it is not true that more than 200,000 boys between 18 and 21 have enlisted since the war began?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely.

Mr. CUMMINS. I say you can not keep them out, and you ought to do something, in my opinion, to relieve the obloquy which rests upon these boys if they can not get in.

Mr. NELSON. You can not keep the boys out if they have got the right patriotic American spirit. They will keep on volunteering; and as to these slackers, what is the use of protecting them? The moral effect of letting Europe know that we have extended the law to reach all classes of our population and bring them into the Army is worth a great deal.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just what I was trying to say, although the Senator from Minnesota has said it more emphatically and said it better. But we will have to recognize the attitude of the boys from 18 to 21. They will not stay at home and be charged with being slackers and indifferent to the war or unable to carry on the war.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me suggest to the Senator that we are now taking steps by this very bill to let men into the service who are under 21. Here we have provisions for reorganizing the National Guard. We are making appropriations for young men to go into the National Guard between 18 and 21, and when they are trained in the National Guard they can be drafted again into the Federal service.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator how he would put into operation this last provision in the amendment:

> That those registered under the age of 21 shall not be drafted nor used for service upon the firing line until they shall have reached the age of 21.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think——

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, just a minute, so that I can explain the proposition. You call upon these men, and they enter your Army before that age. There will be in the company boys of 18 and men of 30. They will drill together. They will come from the same State, generally from the same county and the same township or town. Are you going to segregate those men and put them in a class by themselves and drill them longer when they have had just as much drilling as those who are above 21? Are you going to separate them from their associates and scatter them all over in other units? Are you going to have certain units where none will be above 21 years of age, or how will it operate?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is entirely a matter subject to regulation and adjustment by the Provost Marshal General's office. They may be segregated or they may not. That will be entirely covered by the regulations. I do not think it will require legislation to regulate that matter.

I have said more than I intended to say. I merely wanted to express my views on the age limit. I should like to see the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico amended as I suggested.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to ask the Senator a question before he yields the floor. We all recognize that food production is absolutely necessary to win this war. We have to furnish not only our own people and our own Army but the allies and their armies. Has the Senator any statistics showing how many of these boys would come from farms where they are badly needed for the cultivation of crops and in producing food? Has the Senator gone into the question as to how that would cripple the farmers who are already short of labor?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that that is one of the very reasons why I favor raising the age limit. It is to place those men within military control and let them be detailed for agricultural work. If the age limit is raised, they can be classified by the War Department, and they can be detailed for duty if need be.

Mr. SHIELDS. I was not speaking about raising the age limit. I was speaking about taking the boys who are on the farm, assisting their fathers, as members of his family, in producing crops. I agree with the Senator in raising the age limit to reach men who are just as able-bodied and make as good soldiers as those under 21, say to 35, but it is the question of taking the young boys we are now discussing. They are on the farm, and they are needed there. They are now being educated. They are right in the most important part of their youth in that respect. It would be far better to have men already mature, who are already educated, and who in many cases have left the farms, and allow these young men to stay and be educated and be producers of food, which is indispensable to the winning of this war.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I do not think this amendment to the amendment ought to be adopted. Just now it seems to me the question asked by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is the only one that needs to be considered. Is there any necessity for extending the age limit within the provisions of the draft law at this time? If there is such a necessity, I want to say it has not been brought to my attention as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. I wish to say further that the War Department itself is not making any such demand and it is not considering making such a demand at this time. That is the condition so far as it actually exists and is known to me.

The same question is presented by this amendment to the amendment that has been fought out once and determined adversely. It provides, if it shall be adopted, that these men shall be registered at 18 and shall not be called to fight until they reach 21. You put these 18-year-old men in the cantonments and in the camps where men are needed to be trained now who are going to fight when the training period is over. We have not enough officers, and we have not enough places for training, and we have not enough money to train 3,000,000 men three years, when you can not make soldiers out of them until the end of the three-year period.

We established that at one time to such an extent that the Senate almost unanimously refused to agree to that amendment. Now, why should we impose this burden upon our Military Establishment at this time when we need trained soldiers and need them over in France? We first had over 10,000,000 men registered, and then from 800,000 to a million under the last registration, and we have only about a million and a half with the colors now. What becomes of the other 10,000,000 men? Why shall they not be required to bear the burden of the country now and fight its battles, if it is necessary that they shall do so?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Was the evidence of Gen. Crowder given before the Military Affairs Committee in confidence, and am I at liberty to quote it?

Mr. KIRBY. So far as I know, it was not given before the Military Committee but only to a subcommittee, and it was Gen. Crowder's individual opinion and was not approved by the War Department.

Mr. CUMMINS. Am I at liberty to quote it?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know. I am not a member of the subcommittee. It was not given before the general committee, of which I am a member.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, I do not want to do anything that is improper.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator from Arkansas will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not understand that Gen. Crowder's testimony was confidential; but later, after he left the stand, the Secretary of War asked the committee to withhold from publication the first part of his testimony with reference to the different classes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did that include also secrecy with regard to his opinion touching the advisability of increasing the draft age?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think so—only as to the first part.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not speak of that. It is true that Gen. Crowder appeared before the committee and gave some views sufficient to him, at least, for the increase of the draft age. I do not say the decrease but the increase of the draft age, under 45 years or more.

Mr. THOMPSON. Does the Senator from Arkansas know how many men are available under the first draft between the ages of 21 and 31?

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that about six million or more have been accepted for service.

They are, however, in different classifications and in deferred classifications. There are nearly 600,000 more men under the last class.

Mr. THOMPSON. Less than a third of them are now in the service.

Mr. KIRBY. Less than a third in the first class are in the service. It is said these other men are in different classifications. That may be true, but a man who is 18 years old to-day will be needed in this country 10 years from now as much as or more than the man who is 23 or 25 or 30 years of age. So the country must keep on. We have determined that men shall not be registered and shall not be called on to fight for the country until they are at least allowed to vote; until they are grown. That has been determined upon. We have use for all of our facilities, all the men who are capable of training, and all of our money to train the men who are within the draft age who are subject to call and who are fit to fight.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KIRBY. I do.

Mr. FALL. Do I understand the Senator from Arkansas to say that this proposition has been affirmatively disapproved by the War Department.

Mr. KIRBY. I said it had not been approved by the War Department.

Mr. FALL. I misunderstood the Senator, and I asked so that I might be informed. There is quite a difference between not being approved and being disapproved.

Mr. KIRBY. But it has been disapproved by the Senate, because we fixed the age at 21 years.

Mr. FALL. No; but I asked about the War Department, Mr. President. Has this proposition been disapproved by the Secretary of War?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know that it has been disapproved. All I know is that it has not been approved.

Mr. FALL. Has it been disapproved by the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know whether the President, the Commander in Chief, is familiar with this sort of a proposition or not. It has not come to me that he is in favor of or against it; but I do know that the War Department, whose business it is to consider these matters all along the line and the necessity for increasing the Army or the draft age at this time, has not approved it.

Mr. FALL. I should like to get at just exactly what the situation is. The way the Senator now puts it, it would make the impression upon me that the War Department, in the opinion, at any rate, of the Senator, is opposed to the adoption of this provision.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, it has not come to me in such a way as that, but I do know that the War Department has not approved this sort of policy; I do know that the War Department is not of opinion at this time that this is necessary.

Mr. FALL. The Senator knows that—that the War Department is of opinion at this time that this legislation is not necessary?

Mr. KIRBY. Well, it is not of opinion that it is necessary, I know that. I do not know what it might be along the other side; but the War Department is supposed to be in closer touch with this matter than is anybody else; it is the War Department's business to raise the Army, to train the Army, and to win the fight with the Army after it shall have been trained.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Arkansas, of course, does not mean to say that it is the War Department's business or the business of the administration to raise the Army or to train it under its own rules and under its own regulations for this war?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly not. It is only its business to train the Army after provision is made for raising the Army, as has already been done.

Now, it seems to me that under this condition we ought not at all to fix the age from 18 to 21 and to provide that these soldiers can not be used after they are trained, because we need all the facilities, we need all the money, we need all the use of the training capacity now of the men who are to be used the minute they are trained and ready to fight. Now, let us not clutter it up; let us not burden this legislation with something that can not possibly be of any benefit.

As to the age of 45, that is an old proposition. I do not think it is necessary to go up to that age yet; but if it is, I do not care how far up in that direction you go. Men when they have passed 20 years of age and on up to 45 have enjoyed all the blessings of this life which they could enjoy under the civilization of this time, and it is more their duty to fight, in my opinion, than it is that of the 18-year-old boy, who has not yet been allowed to vote.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Arkansas certainly has not read the amendment, or he would understand that there is nothing whatever in it that requires the boy to be trained for three years, or which requires him to be drafted at all, or which requires him to be drafted for any service at all of any kind or character.

Mr. KIRBY. Well, what is the use of providing here about drafting them, if you do not expect to use them and can not use them under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. FALL. I am pursuing my usually consistent course, and am simply leaving it to the President of the United States, in his discretion, if he needs any of the boys who are between 18 and 21 years of age to call them.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand the Senator's position thoroughly, but since we are not expecting to call, and under the terms of the amendment which the Senator proposes can not call, these men to fight until they are 21 years of age, what is the use of registering and training them now at the expense of the Government, which expense must be maintained?

Mr. FALL. Why, Mr. President, they are simply registered. There is no compulsion upon the President or upon the Secretary of War as to drafting them. They are not compelled to draft them at all; they may not draft one of these men until he is 20, but they may draft him for three months' service, they may draft him for five months' service, or may draft him for any service whatsoever that they require. The only provision of a directory character is that they shall not be used for the firing line until they reach their present draft age of 21 years.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, if it were desired to leave that feature of the legislation out, since these men can not be used as soldiers, and all our efforts must be directed to the training of men who can be used, this amendment could very easily be amended to provide that the age limit might be extended to 45 years; but since there is no necessity apparently for that as yet, I do not see why this bill should be burdened with this sort of an amendment.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield again?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. FALL. We are now registering and drafting boys as soon as they reach the age of 21 under the present law. Would the Senator from Arkansas see any objection to the suggestion of the chairman of the committee that if this amendment were again amended by raising the age to 20 years by striking out "18 years" and inserting "20 years," would the Senator see any objection to the training——

Mr. KIRBY. I certainly would.

Mr. FALL. To the training of these boys prior to the time when they are drafted for service upon the firing line? Might they not well be trained three or six months prior to the time they reach 21 years of age?

Mr. KIRBY. That would be all right if it were necessary to do so; but I do not see any such necessity, for you might train them a whole year before you could use them.

Mr. FALL. There is no compulsion to train them for one month.

Mr. KIRBY. Then do not let us do it if there is no compulsion about it.

Mr. FALL. If we are going to need any more soldiers and are simply going to take away the father from his child and the husband from his wife—all those who have been exempted under the present draft provisions and regulations—if we are going to take them in lieu of taking those over 31 who have no dependents, or those under 21 who have no dependents, if we are going to continue this practice, if we propose to use all the material, before we go outside of the arbitrary limits fixed by the Congress, there is no doubt that we have something like 10,000,000 registered under the first registration.

I want to say to the Senator that it is a matter of common knowledge—whether it is before the Senate committee or not—that we shall not get our next 500,000 men until we go among the exempted classes and take the husbands away from their wives and the fathers away from their children, at a time when we have millions of men here in the United States who are just as fit for military service who have not those ties upon them.

Mr. KIRBY. Why should not the husband be taken from his wife and the father from his children if that is necessary in order to defend the country in which that wife and those children live? Why should such a man have any exemption above the boy who has had no opportunities here?

Mr. FALL. Well, why should there be any exemption, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has stated? Why should not every able-bodied man in the United States, as I have suggested time and time again, be drafted into the service of the United States and be placed by the President of the United States in the position in which he can best serve?

Mr. KIRBY. I think, as the Senator from New Mexico does, that when we were providing for this draft system we should have drafted every man of military age, according to the old requirement, from 18 to 45.

Mr. FALL. That is just what I am trying to get at—to include those from 18 to 45 years of age.

Mr. KIRBY. But we did not do so.

Mr. FALL. We are proposing to do it now.

Mr. KIRBY. And until the War Department thinks it is necessary I do not think we should go ahead here and burden ourselves with the three years' training of men who can not be used until the end of that period.

I hope the amendment will not be adopted, or, if it is adopted, if we want to extend it up—I do not care for that—after the word "and," on line 2, let us strike out everything else and so extend the age limit to 45 years; but as the amendment stands it ought to be defeated, and I hope it will be.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senate in approaching this subject should take into consideration how large an Army the United States should have in this war, how it can be supported, and, incidentally, to what uses it should be put.

As Senators know, under the present system of drafting men between the ages of 21 and 31, inclusive, a questionnaire has been arranged under which the men liable to draft under the registration are classified, and that in class 1 are placed those men who are unmarried and also those men, I think, who, while married, are not in the slightest degree depended upon by their families for support. It has been the ambition of the War Department, as I understand, to recruit the Army of the United States from men of class 1.

A good deal of discussion has taken place in the last few months as to the size of the Army which the United States must put into the field in order to bring our weight to bear in this war in such manner as to bring it to a conclusion in the shortest possible time. Three million men have been mentioned by some as a minimum; others have said 4,000,000 men, and others have said 5,000,000 men. The President of the United States has said there should be no limit, that not even 5,000,000 men should be set as a limit.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. FALL. I gave notice several days ago that I would offer an amendment providing that during this fiscal year not less than 3,000,000 men should be drafted and trained under the provisions of the draft act and used in this war. I shall offer such an amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I remember the fact that the Senator has given notice of such an amendment. Men may differ as to the size of the Army which this country should put into the field. Of course, there is a limit to the annual increment; there is a limit to the number of men which the recruiting machinery and the training machinery can absorb and turn into soldiers in a year's time; but if we are to project our vision toward the future, and a future not very far away, we might just as well make up our minds that we will need at least three million men, and, in all probability, will need 5,000,000 men in arms in the war zones at a given time before this war is ended.

Mr. President, that can not be done by relying solely upon the men in class 1 of the draft with the age limits fixed at 21 and 31. I venture to say to the Senate that if the present program of drafting new soldiers into the Army of the United States is carried on at the rate now proposed and now upon the program of the War Department, class 1 will be exhausted before November 1 next; and if the age limits are not extended both up and down the Provost Marshal General will have to invade class 2 and class 3, in all probability, and take married men whose families are dependent upon them for support, and the skilled workers, whose presence in the munitions factories is essential to the successful conduct of those factories, which, in turn, supply the men in the Army with weapons.

If we fail to raise the age limit, and also to lower it at least two years during this session of Congress, class 1 will have been exhausted before the needs of the Army for the year 1918, both for actual service and for training service, shall have been met; and we will have to disrupt to a greater or less degree—and I believe it will be to a great degree—the industrial and economic organization of the country, including agriculture, by taking married men and men essential in trades and industries in order to get the number of men required by the military situation.

I am in hearty sympathy with the comments made by the Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. KIRBY. Is there anything in the law which prevents an 18-year-old man voluntarily joining the Army, if he desires to do so?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is nothing to prevent it; that is true.

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under that system, however, under which men under 21 may volunteer, but under which no obligation is placed upon all the men under 21, we have the same old distinction, which to my mind is vicious, that those men, we will say, of 20 years who feel it a duty to serve their country go and do it, while those who do not feel it their duty do not do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question. We have now a little more than 10,000,000 men who have been registered and who are subject to draft.

Mr. THOMAS. Nearer 12,000,000 men.

Mr. McKELLAR. My friend from Colorado says "nearer 12,000,000 men." The number is certainly in the neighborhood of 11,000,000 men. We have actually drafted about 2,000,000. Now, does not the Senator suppose when it comes to a question of fair treatment that the 2,000,000 men sometimes have some thoughts in their minds about where the other 9,000,000 men are and how they happen to be in excepted classes? And does not the Senator think we had better make the requirement of service apply first to the whole 11,000,000 who are physically fit?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, of course, operating upon that theory—and I will admit that it is plausible—we could draft all of the 11,000,000 men, but the instant we did so we would have to stop waging the war because we would absolutely wreck our industries. It is all very well to say that every man must serve in the Army as a matter of principle; but if it were attempted, we would be "all army," and would have no industrial organization back of it. It is the very purpose of the selective draft, which so many people seem to forget, namely, to select the men best fitted in every respect, not only on their own account but as citizens of the Republic, to serve in the field, and to let those men who are best fitted to serve in the munitions plants and in other occupations stay and serve there. I would not be at all surprised, Mr. President, if we eventually brought into being and into operation some power which would so arrange things that those men who are in munition plants and who can do their best work in munition plants and similar undertakings should stay there and work, just as we say that the soldier once in the Army shall stay there for the duration of the war.

But, Senators, if we are to have the armies that we are talking about and which are being discussed in the public press and by public men, we have got to raise, and, in my judgment, also lower, the age limit. There are several phases of this matter which I think are well worthy of discussion, and I wish to enter into one or two of them very briefly.

Senators will remember that the Provost Marshal General has sent out an order to the local draft boards, if I remember correctly, instructing them to put into class 1, and make liable for immediate military service thereby, all men who are not usefully employed. The application of that order, of course, is confined to men not usefully employed between the ages of 21 and 31. Its influence will be beneficial. It will compel some men to undertake a useful job or else serve in the Army, and most of those men must undertake a useful job under those circumstances because they have families to support. That order has, however, a very limited application, because there is not a very large percentage of men between the ages of 21 and 31 who are not usefully employed; but when you pass the age of 31 and extend it to the age of 45 and apply that same order of the Provost Marshal General, you will find thousands and thousands of men who are to-day not usefully employed and who, under that order, being subject to the draft and subject to being placed in class 1 and liable to immediate military service, will quickly find, in defense of their own families, some useful employment; and you will thereby add to the available labor supply of the country, which every Senator knows in some parts of the country is scarce at the present time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator's opinion of an amendment to the present military law providing that all persons between the ages of 30 and 40 who have not families to support shall be called into the service before those between the ages of 20 and 30 having families to support shall be drafted. To make myself clear, at the present time if we continue to raise very large armies—and I think everybody is in favor of that; I know I am—and we raise them out of the limited number of men between the ages of 21 and 31, I am fearful we will soon reach fathers of families and take them even though families are dependent upon them. At the same time there will be a large number of men between 30 and 40 who have no families whatever dependent upon them and who are capable of military service. Now, the suggestion which I have to make, and which I may embody in the form of an amendment, is as to the propriety of calling unmarried men between 30 and 40 for military service before we call upon the married men between 20 and 30 for military service. When I say "married men" I mean those whose families are dependent upon them. I should like to get the Senator's opinion upon that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the Senator from Missouri on that proposition, but let me say to him that that is exactly what the questionnaire system, under which all registrants are classified, does; and that same questionnaire system and that same classification would hold good in its operation among the men between the ages of 31 and 40 as it now holds good among the men between the ages of 21 and 31. The amendment of the Senator from New Mexico makes no suggestion of a change in the classification, and if it is adopted, or if its provisions are approximately adopted, the first men to be called and, in my judgment, the only men who will be called, unless most unlooked-for events overtake us, will be those men who are put in class 1.

They are the unmarried men; and, regardless of their age, so long as they are, as the Senator from New Mexico suggests, between 18 and 45, if they are unmarried and have no dependents, they will be equally liable to service. I think that is the system under which we must operate so long as we can, and I think we can raise and maintain a most impressive Army under such a system.

Mr. REED. I was obliged to leave the Chamber while the Senator was speaking. Did the Senator state the number of men whom it is estimated we can raise under the present law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, my knowledge of that is not absolutely definite; and, in addition to that, I have some hesitancy in discussing it and the source of my information. I doubt if those figures should be discussed in public. I think some of them have been discussed.

Mr. REED. I do not think we need to be sensitive about that, because statements concerning the figures have been made from time to time, but they have escaped me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps I do not understand the question.

Mr. REED. The question I am asking is how many men we can put into the Army under the present law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In addition to the number now in the service?

Mr. REED. Yes. I was going to follow that with a further question as to how many of them there were in class 5, which, I believe, embraces married men with families dependent upon them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My understanding is that from class 1 as now registered we can get approximately 500,000 in addition to those in the service to-day.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I shall try to get the exact figures. I thought perhaps he had them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me say to the Senator from Missouri that that estimate may vary from the truth somewhat; it is merely a rough estimate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many men is it estimated we can get from the new registration that took place on June 5 last?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been suggested that there are fully 700,000 men who would come in under that registration. That would give us 1,200,000 more men subject to draft at this time without going any further.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator must remember that it is very easy to say that we have 700,000 soldiers in addition to our present force by reason of the fact that 700,000 men have registered, but he must remember that there is quite a percentage of physical defectives——

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I understand that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Men who are not fit for military service. In that connection, may I say that I am in sympathy with what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has said. The percentage of those who are physically unfit for military service amongst those men under 21 and down to 18 is considerably less than the percentage unfit for military service amongst those, we will say, around 30. I sympathize with the Senator from Minnesota in his estimate of what the young man does in the way of campaigning. The man between 18 and 25, generally speaking, is the man who can fight on or work on with little or no sleep; who can lie down for an hour or two hours, get a nap, awake refreshed, and resume his work. It is for that reason, I believe, more than any other, that all the armies in all the great wars that have lasted any length of time have turned out to be at the conclusion of those wars largely made up of men around 20 years of age. They are the men who survive; they are the ones who stand the work best; they are the ones who suffer least; and they make the best soldiers. I think any Army officer of broad experience in the training of men will admit that the men under 25, and preferably around 21 or 20 or even 19, are the men who make the best soldiers, and of whom the greater percentage survives until the conclusion of the war in which they are engaged.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the question propounded by the Senator from Missouri was either misunderstood or the Senator from New York has some reluctance about answering it. I think it ought to be answered, unless there is a real reason for not having the facts before the Senate.

I have given some study to these figures of the work of the War Department. There were about 9,600,000 men registered between 21 and 31, I believe. About 20 or 25 per cent of them have been found, under the rules, physically unfit for service; so that if the entire number of men between 21 and 31 were put into the Army we would have an Army of about 7,000,000 men. We have already called probably a million and a half of them; so that if we should exhaust all the classes arranged for by the Provost Marshal General we would have about five and a half million who might yet be put into the Army. But to take them without regard to their occupations or their dependents would dislocate not only the social but the industrial life of the United States; and in the very nature of things, in my opinion, we are bound not only to go above 31 but to go below 21. I shall have some figures to present on that point presently.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The argument the Senator from Iowa has just made is the one I have been trying to emphasize. Senators, if we do not raise and lower these age limits we can not put into the field an army worthy of our strength and worthy of the obligations that we must carry in this war without disrupting the industry and the agriculture of the country behind that army; and I am one of those Senators who believe that this is indeed a world war. We speak of it as such, but a great many of us are inclined to direct our attention solely to one phase of the war. A good many people in the United States, a good many of us in our discussions here in the Senate, direct our entire attention to the western front. Of course it is the most important front, and I think no one would deny that.

But, Mr. President, this ought to be, in fact as well as in name, a world war; and if America can do it, if America can supply the surplus of men and material, of soldiers and weapons, over and above what is actually necessary to establish a clear preponderance of weight upon the western front, then, indeed, America should use that surplus of men and materials in combating the Germans, no matter where they are found on this earth—the Germans and their allies—and by that I mean Bulgaria and Turkey, just as we classify Austria. Make it a world war, Senators, and we will end it sooner.

Of course, we should place our first and greatest emphasis in France. No one will deny that for a moment. We must establish there a clear preponderance, so that the Teutonic powers will never again enjoy the offensive upon that front, but shall be subjected to an offensive on the part of ourselves and our allies which they will be unable to resist and which will eventually crush them, even if we do not attack them from any other quarter. But I believe that this country is big enough and strong enough and rich enough to do more than that. We should help the Italian Army. Senators, would it not be a blessing if there were an American Army corps along the Piave River this very day to help drive home the defeat that the Italians are inflicting upon our enemies, the Austrians?

I am not complaining that they are not there, Mr. President. Perhaps it could not have been done by this time—the sending of a considerable American expedition to help the Italians—but it ought to be done just as soon as possible. We should attack the Teutonic powers from every quarter in which we can find any facilities for attacking them, even if it be through Siberia. True, it will be a difficult undertaking; but should that stay us from attempting it if we can thereby add to the difficulties of the Teutonic powers? We should attack them, if we can, in Palestine, reinforcing the British, and by the elimination and crushing of Turkey prevent Germany from developing and possessing the oil fields in the Batum Province of the Caucasus, whose resources will soon be used against our men in France.

It is part of the war for America—and I believe she can do it—to bring every influence that she possesses to bear in the fight against these people, wherever they may be found, wherever they are organizing or working for the undoing, eventually, of the United States; and, Senators, we can not do it unless we have clearly in mind the raising and the maintenance of a great American Army. Yes; make it 5,000,000 men if it is necessary. As the President says, why limit it? When it is raised, use it wherever it can be of service—not only in France, but in Italy; in the Balkans, if need be; in Asia Minor, helping out the British, who have already done such remarkable work there in Palestine and Mesopotamia; and even in Siberia, where there are many, many thousands of Russians who would rally around an American force and prevent the organization, for military purposes, of that great country by the Germans. Let us reestablish the eastern front, renew and rebuild the iron ring that surrounded Germany and Austria up to a year ago.

The collapse of Russia in many respects made this a new war. It completely changed the picture, and the picture was changed to our disadvantage. We lost something like 8,000,000 soldiers when the Russian Army disbanded, not as a result of a military victory on the part of Germany, but as a result of German propaganda. Can America do something to restore that situation? Can America do something, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] said so eloquently a few days ago, to attack Austria, that empire that contains within its borders such a tremendous element of discontent and rebellion? I believe she can; and if at first we accomplished only a little in those far-away regions of the earth, our influence would in the end be decisive. We must look forward to these efforts and lay the foundations now.

That is one of the reasons, Mr. President, why I support the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico, because I believe that only by such an amendment, or something closely approximating it, can America put an army into the field big enough to undertake these great tasks and carry the obligation and meet the opportunities that this great country of ours ought to carry and ought to meet, and, God willing, will carry and will meet, before this war is over.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, whenever it is necessary, or, indeed, whenever it is expedient, I am willing to vote to raise the age limit, or, possibly, to lower the limit somewhat. I am opposed to this amendment as now proposed. I am rather inclined to think that 18 years is too low a limit, but whenever it becomes necessary I will vote to lower the limit or to raise it. Indeed, I will vote for any measure that will mean early victory against Germany. But before we adopt this particular amendment we ought to give it very careful consideration. The proviso to the amendment is all wrong and can serve no useful purpose. It simply ties up and renders ineffective three classes of boys to the number of some 2,500,000 or 3,000,000.

This particular legislation has been considered neither by the War Department, so far as I am advised, nor by the Committee on Military Affairs, whose province and duty it is to consider this kind of proposal. I am not one of those who believe we ought to follow whatever a department recommends; but, Senators, we must remember that we have turned over to the War Department the duty of executing the laws that we make about this war. We must remember it is not an original proposition. It is a proposed addition to a system that we have already put in the hands of the War Department to execute. We have already given the War Department registered men in the number of about 11,000,000. They have actually drafted about a million and a half men, and the remainder are still registered and still subject to the draft. Under this state of facts who would know whether the limits fixed in that draft law should be changed better than the department that is now executing this very law? The officers charged with the execution of this law know whether or not they have the men there; they know whether or not the limit ought to be changed; and it seems to me we ought to have some recommendation from that department before enacting this very important amendment to the legislation. There are so many things to be considered in connection with this kind of legislation—the question of subsistence, the question of clothing for the additional men brought under the draft, the question of guns, the question of training, the question of officers. All these things have to be considered, and primarily they have to be considered by the department that is executing this law.

Why should we, without any advice as to what men are needed, without any advice that there is a deficiency or likely to be one, change this law at this time? Why should we change the law when there are, according to the undisputed evidence, some 9,000,000 men registered in this country and subject to draft between the ages of 21 and 31 years, but who have not as yet been actually drafted?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Of course, the Senator does not want to leave a false impression.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely not.

Mr. REED. The Senator has stated that there are approximately 11,000,000 men within the draft ages. A million and a half have been called to the service, and that leaves approximately nine and a half million. Now, of course, the Senator knows, if he will stop to think, that there is no such number liable to military duty, because the million and a half that have been taken have been the perfect men; that is, they have been the men who have qualified for military service. A very large number of rejections took place in order to get that million and a half men. A very large number of rejections necessarily will take place among the others that may be called hereafter.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. REED. So that we can not use the figures the Senator is using.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, on the contrary, we can use those figures, though, of course, we must always take into consideration the fact that there are some exemptions under the draft law. The physically unfit are exempted. Some are exempted because engaged in industry or in agriculture and some few others for the other causes set forth in the act. The fact remains, however, that of 11,000,000 registered only about 1,500,000 have actually been drafted into the service, and everybody knows that this is a very small percentage of soldiers of those registered. Undoubtedly there is still a large number of soldiers to be secured from those already registered—probably many more than can be trained this year.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. A very great many have enlisted and gone into the Army through enlistment.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true, too, and those are to be taken into consideration; but the fact remains that we have not actually drafted 20 per cent of the men who are registered between 21 and 31, and the other fact remains that the War Department has not furnished any data or statistics showing that there is a lack of men to go into the Army from those already registered.

Whenever it does—whenever there is any evidence, whether it comes from the War Department or not, that we are short of men, or that we are likely to be short of men—I am willing to get those men wherever we can get them. But in the absence of that kind of evidence, on the floor of the Senate, without any consideration by the committee—the committee has not had the question before it—without deliberation, without knowledge of the facts for the most part, without any recommendation from the War Department, it seems to me that we ought not to run roughshod over that department and force on them a registration that evidently they do not want at this time. If we were putting into operation an original system, perhaps we would not need any information from the department. But we are undertaking by this amendment to add to a system which the department is now engaged in carrying out without waiting to see whether the proposed amendment fits in with the department plans or not.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. The Senator, of course, sees the casualty lists published in the morning papers, and he knows that our military force is being rapidly decreased.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do. I regret very much that that is the fact.

Mr. FALL. Of course, the Senator further realizes that in so far as the War Department is concerned the only work that would be placed upon the War Department by the adoption of this amendment is not one of providing for subsistence, and not one of providing for munitions or arms or anything of that kind, but is simply the additional burden of registration until the Commander in Chief of the Army sees fit to draft these men.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico to his own amendment:

Provided, That those registered under the age of 21 shall not be drafted nor used for service upon the firing line until they shall have reached the age of 21.

That means this, that the War Department must take these 2,400,000 young men or thereabouts—it is estimated that about 800,000 to 1,000,000 of them come of a fixed age each year—and the War Department must do something with them. There can be but one purpose if the amendment is to do any good, and that is that they must be trained. By implication, at least, the department is directed to train them. They have to be put into units; they have to have officers; they have to have guns; they have to be put in cantonments; additional cantonments must be built for them.

Mr. FALL. What are we doing with the 10,000,000 men now registered? How many of those are we training?

Mr. McKELLAR. Apparently there are some seven or eight million—75 or 80 per cent of them—with whom nothing is being done. They have not been called to the colors. They are registered, ready to be called whenever the department calls on them; and why should they be excused at this time?

Mr. FALL. Why? That is precisely the point. There is no more compulsion in regard to calling the entire 100 per cent of these men than there is in regard to calling the entire 100 per cent of those now registered. Mr. President, this is merely a direction to extend the ages for registration. In so far as the drafting, use, subsistence, training, or handling of those men is concerned, the discretion is left absolutely in the Commander in Chief, exactly as it is with reference to the 10,000,000 men now registered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator intend that those now registered and subject to military duty shall be called before any classes of those between 18 and 45, as provided in his amendment, are called?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator does not intend to do anything whatsoever except to bow his head in obedience to the action of Congress before investing discretion in the Commander in Chief of the Army. If the Senator from New Mexico could enforce his views upon the Senator from Tennessee and his other colleagues here, the Senator would see engrafted into legislation a direction to the President—the Commander in Chief—the Department of War, the Judge Advocate General, and others as to how this Army should be raised and what should be done with it under the Constitution. But the Senator bows himself to the will of the majority, as expressed, and simply provides for additional registration and leaves the discretion entirely in the hands of the Commander in Chief.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as a matter of fact the Commander in Chief has authority now. He has control of the situation. He has these millions of young men between the ages of 21 and 31 that he has not called out. He has not asked that that number be increased. He has not said that the number now registered will soon be exhausted. Whenever he does, as Commander in Chief, it is our duty to give him the necessary men. Whenever he says that he believes that that list of men is not sufficient, that we need more men, then it is our duty to give him the men and uphold him in the prosecution of this war, and we will do it without delay whenever he, or his military representative, makes the request. But the Commander in Chief is not making any such request of us now, and we surely have ample men already registered at this time. There is one thing I can say for this country, whatever else may be said of it, and that is that its man power is all right. There has been no trouble about getting men. We can substantially get all the men we need at any time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee said a few moments ago that the committee had given no thought or examination to this subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true, Mr. President, so far as my knowledge of it goes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why did it not do so?

Mr. McKELLAR. It was not called to our attention. We had registered some seven or eight or nine million of young men—somewhere in that neighborhood—between the ages of 21 and 31 and not yet drafted. We saw no reason to exempt these young men, whether they were in deferred classes or not. It was the purpose of the law to make it bear equally on all. This legislation in the proposed amendment can have but one purpose at this time, and that is to let men in the deferred classes be exempted, and I do not think they ought to be exempted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not speaking about the merits of the proposal. I am speaking about the consideration the committee gave to the subject. Something like two weeks ago I introduced a proposed amendment to the military bill which is in effect the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico. It was printed, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I asked for an opportunity to be heard upon that amendment; but the committee, I assume, were so much occupied with other affairs that it never became convenient. But the amendment was before the committee proposing this identical thing; and the Senator from Tennessee knows that the very man who is in charge of the administration of the draft law, who knows more about it than any other man in the country, believes, and so told a subcommittee at least of the Military Affairs Committee, that the draft age ought to be increased in order to meet emergencies that will occur not later than the early part of the year 1919.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was not present at the meeting to which the Senator refers and I do not personally know of such evidence. I was not a member of the subcommittee, and I did not hear the testimony of Gen. Crowder. I want to indorse all that the Senator says about Gen. Crowder. I think he is one of the most capable and competent officers of this Government. I think he has rendered a service to our Army and to our Government that is not surpassed by that of any other officer in the Army. There is no one who could have performed the great task of organizing the drafted forces of this country better than Gen. Crowder has done. I indorse every word the Senator has said about him; but, as a matter of fact, whatever views Gen. Crowder may entertain have not matured to the point of his formally bringing them before the Military Affairs Committee, and they have not been brought before that committee, and the matter has not been considered or debated before that committee, so far as I know. I think, in all fairness, that a matter so important as this ought to be carefully considered by the committee, especially when we have at least some seven millions of men to draw from, already registered, that we can call out at any time we want to, and when there is no demand for it by the proper authorities. If Gen. Crowder made the demand, he has evidently yielded to the views of others to some extent, because no demand has been made in our committee for this legislation, and I think it ought to come before the committee and be carefully considered by it before the legislation is enacted. Now, mind you, I do not object at all to increasing the age limit or even to lowering it to a limited degree, but I do not think it ought to be done now, in this hasty way.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that Gen. Crowder has made no demand, nor would any other officer of the Government make a demand, upon Congress for particular, specific legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether the Senator is correct about that or not. I think there are a great many who make distinct demands on us for legislation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not speaking now of the President of the United States——

Mr. McKELLAR. I was not speaking of the President, either.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because the President has a perfect right to recommend legislation to Congress. I am not now going into the realm of secrecy. I do not find it necessary to go to the testimony given by Gen. Crowder before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McKELLAR. The subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I go to the public press, in which it was stated that Gen. Crowder entertained certain views on this subject; and I say again, and I am glad the Senator from Tennessee agrees with me, that I think his administration of the draft law is a monument of industry, intelligence, and patriotism, and there is no testimonial that I would not gladly bear for his work in this great and important matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. And if the Senator will excuse me one minute I will go a little bit further than that, and I will say that I think it is the duty of Congress properly to recognize officially the splendid work Gen. Crowder has done for the country in this hour of its trouble. He has made such a splendid success of the draft law that, in my judgment, Congress should grant him specifically some fitting mark of its appreciation of his great service. He is a man of unusual ability and marvelous aptitude for the particular work intrusted to him.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator. Three weeks ago or more some one published in one of the newspapers in Washington a statement indicating that this officer of the Army was in favor of increasing the draft age so as to enlarge the authority of the President in calling men into the service. It was stated in that newspaper, as I recollect, that the Secretary of War was not yet ready to insist upon legislation of this character, but that he released Gen. Crowder from any obligation to further keep his own views a secret, and they were published; and it is now as well known as any fact can be known that this eminent officer believes that this legislation is necessary, not only for the good of the Army but for the good of the industries of the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. I, of course, do not keep up, I am sorry to say, with the newspapers like I ought. In the tremendous rush of work now falling on all of us, I simply do not have time. I do not think I am able to recall that, but I accept what the Senator says was published in those papers.

I want to say this about it: We have intrusted to the military department of the Government the execution of the draft act. We have given them already ten or eleven million names to draw from. They have never complained that they have not enough. When they do, then we must give them additional men. We must give them every man they need. We must go to the last limit to win this war. There is no limit—age or any other kind of limit, to which we will not go. I accept, of course, what the Senator says—that Gen. Crowder expressed some such views when he appeared before the subcommittee, but what I mean to say is that neither he nor anyone in his department has sent official notice to Congress that the law already passed is not sufficient for the present.

Now, in all good common sense, is it not wise to let them mature their plans? Let Gen. Crowder, in whom I have the greatest confidence, and in whom the Senator has the greatest confidence, mature his plans for getting additional men, and let us have the advantage of the department's plan when we pass upon the kind of legislation provided in this amendment.

We do not have to accept any advice or plan offered by the department. It may be a plan that I would not subscribe to and that the Senator would not subscribe to; but at all events, they have the execution of these plans within their power and judgment and they ought to be consulted before passing such drastic legislation. It seems to me that we ought to have their advice; that we ought to consult them; and it ought to be worked out in the way Congress has given the authority to work out these things, and not have it come before the Senate by offering an amendment on the floor which may or may not fit the plans of those who are executing the laws.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be delighted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has not the situation changed somewhat? The House bill, which is not modified by the Committee on Military Affairs, gives the President unlimited authority to call for all the men he thinks necessary for the prosecution of the war.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. Heretofore we have given the President no such authority. I am not protesting against that authority, although it might be helpful for Congress to keep it in its own hands. But, however that may be, we are giving that authority.

Now, does not the Senator think when we give this broad, unrestricted authority to draw men from civil life into the military forces of the country we ought also to broaden the field from which he may draw the men?

Mr. McKELLAR. I feel quite sure that that will come. If it had been thought by the Commander in Chief, when he asked for that broadening of authority, that it was wise to increase the number of men who could be drafted he would have said so. He is in touch with the situation. His Secretary of War is in touch with the situation. They know what their plans are, and I am glad to say that they have progressed splendidly with those plans. It seems to me that they are progressing well enough with those plans to-day for us to have reasonable confidence in them. They have gotten practically a million men in Europe at this hour, and it seems to me before we pass a radical measure of this kind we might give that department credit enough for their good work to consult them. We have not consulted them. They have not recommended this legislation to our committee. When they do, it seems to me we ought to consult among ourselves and report to this body the best bill we know how to frame along those lines in accordance with the plans which the department is now carrying out so well.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator from Indiana soon, but I will yield immediately to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee must have observed that under this amendment the President still has complete, absolute discretion. He can draw men from the ages of 21 to 31 before drafting a single man either below the age of 21 or above 30.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will excuse me a moment, I know he does not want to make a mistake about that. The President is given no authority to deal with men under the age of 21.

Mr. CUMMINS. Absolutely. In my judgment there is nothing to interfere with the President's existing authority to classify these men in any way he sees fit.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, of course, to classify them, but if the Senator will excuse me, we are in a war now. We are not preparing for war. We have a war on our hands and under this proviso in the amendment the President would be powerless to use young men under 21 years of age for actual service in fighting for our country. They are taken out of his power completely for a period of three years, and we ought not to do it. I think if we are going to reduce the age limit we ought to give him power to call on those just like he calls on any other drafted men. We ought not to make classes among drafted men.

Mr. CUMMINS. It enlarges the power and gives him power to deal with men above 30.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does so far as men above 30 are concerned, but so far as men below 21 are concerned it limits his power.

Mr. CUMMINS. He has no power to deal with them now at all?

Mr. McKELLAR. He certainly has the right to accept them as volunteers now and many of them are entering the service that way.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am about to yield the floor. I have talked longer than I should have.

Mr. FALL. I was going to ask the Senator a question. I will say to him for his gratification that I expressed my views upon this proviso when I offered the amendment, and I agree with him exactly. I shall perfect the amendment by striking out the proviso.

Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that my idea in offering this amendment and providing that the ages between 18 and 21 should not be used on the firing line, except that the discretion is left to the President of the United States as Commander in Chief, who has just as much sense as the Senator from New Mexico or the Senator from Tennessee, as to what he shall do with these boys between 18 and 21 years. I will be very frank with the Senator. If I had the enforcement of a provision of this kind, during a vacation I might call out all these boys for one or two months and train them and send them back.

Mr. McKELLAR. Where would the Senator get the officers to train them?

Mr. FALL. Every noncommissioned officer—does the Senator mean to say that he does not anticipate enlarging the present Army?

Mr. McKELLAR. I certainly do expect our Army to be increased. I think it ought to be increased as fast as we can train and ship the men—increased to 3,000,000, to 5,000,000, or even to 10,000,000, or to any number necessary to whip the Germans; but noncommissioned officers are not available to train these boys, but are used to train men who are going to France.

Mr. FALL. We can get noncommissioned officers as every other military country has done. Then in training them, if we are going to enlarge the Army, we have officers to train men under 21.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I disagree with the Senator entirely on the subject of having ample officers to train these men. We are having great trouble in securing competent officers to train the men to go to France.

Mr. FALL. Suppose——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. We are training them as rapidly as we can. We are making splendid headway with this training. I know it must be a source of pride and gratification not only to the Members of the Senate but to the people of the United States that we are making such headway with the training of our forces in getting them on the battle line. Now, when we are just getting in our stride, pressing forward, making tremendous headway in this fight, why dissipate our forces by in effect making schools for these young men under 21 years of age and preventing them from going into the Army until they are 21? What we ought to do is to centralize our efforts upon winning this war at this time, and then later on we can talk about universal military training and other kindred subjects which are in substance incorporated in this proviso.

I hope the Senator will not only perfect the amendment by withdrawing the proviso, which he suggests he will do, but that he will leave it to the War Department now to conduct and to carry on this war in the way they have set forward. They have the plans and know what the facts are; they know what their abilities are to get officers and equipment with which to train the men, and I think it ought to be left to that department, at least, to suggest changes in the draft law.

The proviso in this amendment should by all means be withdrawn or defeated, and I believe it would be better to defer action on the whole subject until we have all the facts before us. The Congress will at any time enlarge the limits of the draft law when it is made manifest that an enlargement is necessary. There will be no trouble on earth about getting a bill or resolution for such a purpose through at any time that it may be asked for by our military authorities.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Can the Senator give us anything like an accurate estimate of the number of men under the operations of the present selective-service law who have been actually put on the battle line?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been informed that there are about a million and a half or a little more than a million and a half who have been drafted out of the number of between nine and ten million in the first registration.

Mr. WATSON. What per cent of those are in fighting units, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know what per cent. The Senator will recall that recently resolutions have passed asking for the number, and I believe the number has not yet been ascertained and given to Congress. I can not furnish those figures to the Senate, but I know that less than 20 per cent of all those within draft age and registered have been actually drafted up to this date, and I think there must still be a very large number, probably many more than can be trained this year, still subject to draft and fit for service under that first registration. In addition there remains the 800,000 registered in June, 1918, of which probably 75 per cent, or 600,000, are fit for service.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish simply to answer the question which was asked by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] as to what per cent are in fighting units. I wish to call attention to the fact that the evidence before the committee, as I am informed, was that 58 per cent are within fighting units, and, of course, that would leave 42 per cent who are not.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the purport of this amendment is to substitute for the ages 21 and 31 in the existing law the ages of 18 and 45. If in the enactment of that law the limit of the draft had been fixed at 18 and 45 instead of 21 and 31, then the law would have been, and would still be, precisely as it will be if this amendment to the amendment is adopted.

It was stated many times here in the discussion of the present draft law that the 10-year limitation which it fixed as the basis of coercion would bring within its provisions upward of 11,000,000 men, and that, making allowance for defective physical conditions and for express exemptions and for exemptions which would be permissible under the discretion of the statute, there would remain an available force fit for military duty of something more than 5,000,000 men. I may be inaccurate in some of these statements, but such is my recollection. It was also insisted that within the limitations of the law there would be found an ample force of men for the great emergency confronting the people of the United States.

I opposed that measure largely because I did not believe in substituting the draft for the volunteer system, and incidentally because it seemed to me that if we were to go to the draft system we should abandon the volunteer system. I had no reason then, Mr. President, and certainly I have none now, to question the accuracy of the estimates which were made concerning the force available under the law. I believe, and still believe, that inasmuch as they were carefully made by experts along that line we could rely upon them substantially.

Now, Mr. President, it appears in this discussion that we have taken from this available force approximately one and one-half millions of men, a number, however, which includes a very considerable proportion of volunteers under and over the age limitations. So it is safe to say that there could be an available force of three and one-half millions, plus the number covered by our amendment to that law and enacted at this session of Congress, for our immediate need.

If I am correct in my recollection concerning these estimates, then it would seem unnecessary to resort at this time to so sweeping a measure as the one now under consideration, which extends from 18 to 45 and embraces a period of life nearly three times as great as that which is covered by the existing statute.

If I thought it were necessary, if the time ever comes when the department determines that it is necessary to extend this limitation even beyond that proposed by the amendment, I should not hesitate to vote for it if I should be in the Senate at that time. But, Mr. President, until we are semiofficially informed that it is essential I doubt the wisdom, I doubt the expediency of the enactment of this proposed extension.

Something has been said about the moral effect this amendment would have upon our enemy. I think it was stated by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that in the event this amendment was enacted the population of the central empires would feel that we had taken this step expressive of our resolution and determination in this war and possibly weaken their own. Of course, I do not pretend to use the exact phraseology of the Senator, but such, in substance, was its intent.

Mr. President, in my judgment, if there should be any consequent effect upon the minds or the morale of our enemies through the enactment of this measure, it would be precisely to the contrary.

Another Senator has said that Germany knows our military condition as well, if not better, than many of us. I have no doubt that is true; but if within one year and two months after the enactment of a conscript law, which was then declared by its advocates to be all that was necessary for the mobilization of such man power in this country as the war required, we should follow it by extending that age limitation from 18 to 45, the inference would logically be that we had exhausted our efforts to secure the service of men within the first limitation and were therefore compelled as a military necessity to extend the law so that it would be commensurate with the volunteer age fixed in that or some other statute and which is the law of the country. If, therefore, our object is to appall the enemy with the magnitude of our potential preparations, it will, in my judgment, fail of its purpose, although, of course, I know the author of this amendment had no such purpose in view. He has been consistently from the commencement of this gigantic struggle an advocate of an enormous military force, a believer in the mobilization of every resource of the country, and in making every possible effort within our power against the enemy.

I believe so, too, Mr. President, but I differ very materially as to the manner in which it is to be done, and I differ also, perhaps, in my conception of the extent to which we can do it.

I have heard a great deal recently from those in high authority and those in lower authority, and from those who are not in authority at all, about the importance of mobilizing and placing at once upon the front an American Army of 5,000,000 men; that before the war shall have been ended it will be necessary to have such an army there. I hope such will not prove to be the case. If it does, Mr. President, we will endeavor to meet the necessity and provide for it even before it shall appear upon the horizon.

But we are apt in this country to use large figures and make large statements, sometimes without a due conception of what they involve. It has required us something like 14 months to place upon the French front an army of nearly a million men, or, speaking more correctly, I should say a force of nearly a million men, of which about 60 per cent are effective. In doing that we have made the greatest possible draft upon our transportation capacity, not only upon the seas but upon the land. During the last three months the accomplishment of the War Department in the mobilization of troops 3,000 miles across the sea has no parallel in the history of the world. And yet during that period, at a time when we had to strain every nerve at our command, we have not moved, I think, to exceed 250,000 or 300,000 men.

It is all very well to talk about striking the German wherever you can find them, to send an army to Mesopotamia, another to Macedonia, and another to Siberia, and thus mingle our troops with the troops of the allies wherever there is an objective point. The conception, Mr. President, is a noble one. The possibility of its execution is another question entirely. We can not do it, or at least we can not do it at present, because forsooth, Mr. President, we are doing all that our present capacity will permit in peopling the war front with a great army of American soldiers.

I do not think that I betray any secrets when I state that it requires about 9 tons of capacity per annum to supply each American soldier in France with the equipment necessary to sustain him physically and in a military sense. His clothing, his food, his munitions, his gun, his artillery, his aircraft equipment—all the paraphernalia of modern warfare—require 9 tons per annum, or 9,000,000 tons for 1,000,000 men. Of course, perhaps one-third of that is sufficient for the reason that more than three round trips may be made by the same vessel during that period of time, but when we consider the enormous demand upon the tonnage of the world for other purposes, for furnishing food for our allies, for supplying them with war materials and all other material for which they are dependent on other sections of the world, the wonder is that we have been able to secure tonnage sufficient to make the record of the last three months. We are building ships. Thank God they are coming now with reasonable rapidity, and I trust will soon cross the line between the amount of tonnage sunk and the amount of tonnage created. Yet they are not building one-third, perhaps, of the number that could be used. We can not get them too fast, and some one must build them. We may have five million, seven and a half million, ten million effective troops, but the enemy is across the sea, and we must cross the sea to get at him.

When we are talking about an army of 5,000,000 men across the sea, we should think of the 45,000,000 tons of carrying capacity that will be essential for their sustenance and support. To transport an army to France or anywhere else and then leave it unprotected and unprovided for is unthinkable; it is impossible.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in a moment. Where are the men coming from, Mr. President, if we are to subject everybody from 18 to 45 to the draft? Where shall we look for the human material necessary for the construction of that one tremendous item so absolutely and unavoidably essential to a successful prosecution of the war? I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator has made the statement that it takes nine tons of material per annum to supply a single soldier, and that 5,000,000 troops, therefore, would require 45,000,000 tons. He does not, I take it, however, mean that that signifies that we must have a ship tonnage of 45,000,000?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; not for that purpose.

Mr. REED. But that is because each ship would make several trips during the year?

Mr. THOMAS. Each ship would make several trips.

Mr. REED. How many tons does the Senator estimate it would take in tonnage of vessels? How much would we have to increase our floating tonnage?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think it would be safe, Mr. President, to rely upon less than 15,000,000 tons. It is true also that faster vessels can make more than three turnabout trips, as they are called, per annum; but when you consider the necessity for repairs, the danger from the submarines, and the other accidents that may, and generally do, interfere with the regularity of such voyages, you must have something of a margin, and count, say, three trips to each vessel per annum between America and Europe.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I read in a morning newspaper a day or two ago that there were 89 ships to be launched on the 4th day of July next. I will ask my colleague whether his investigation, which has been recently made, confirms that or whether it does not?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, our investigation, which has been made recently, had reference to another sort of ship. I wish to God I could say there were going to be 45,000,000 tons of airships, or an amount proportioned to 45,000,000 tons of shipping in position to aid our troops and help win the victory within the next nine mnths.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to inquire of his colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] if he read at the same time that there had been 640,000 gross tons of shipping sunk during the month of May?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, at the time I read both accounts I do not recall having seen a statement of the tonnage sunk so large as the statement made by the Senator from North Dakota; but I will accept his statement.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether that 640,000 gross tons, which was stated to have been sunk during the month of May, does not comprehend the shipping of all of the nations? The 89 ships which are to be launched on the Fourth of July next, however, contemplate only what this Nation alone is doing.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; the Senator from Colorado is correct; it refers to the shipping of all nations; but there are only two nations that are building ships which amount to anything, and those are the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator from North Dakota should add Japan as doing pretty well now.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado what amount of tonnage we now have in operation, if he knows?

Mr. THOMAS. I am unable to answer that question. Both on account of the sinkings and on account of additions, the amount of our shipping is constantly changing. I was going to attempt to approximate, but I shall not try to do so, as I have but little knowledge upon the subject.

I may say to my colleague, however, that the 89 ships which are to be launched upon the Fourth of July next, if I remember the account correctly, do not aggregate quite a million tons; most of them are of small size; so that their aggregate tonnage, while very considerable and very creditable, is a very small proportion of the amount of tonnage that is so badly needed at the present time.

Mr. REED. It is to be a Fourth of July spurt; it does not mean that we are going to get that much on the 2d of July or on the 3d, but only on the Fourth.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, Mr. President, that is a very timely suggestion. We are going to make on the Fourth day of July, the natal day of the Nation, a special effort to launch more ships than perhaps we shall launch for a good many days succeeding. So in determining how many troops we are going to send to France, we must not lose sight of our capacity to send them. I am not at all sure that it is a proper policy to equip, discipline, and train more soldiers than we can send or more soldiers than we know, with a reasonable degree of accuracy, that we can send within the next 6, 8, or 10 months.

Mr. President, I do not believe that I minimize at all the tremendous task confronting this Nation. I believe that I feel and realize quite as keenly as do any of my colleagues or any of my fellow citizens, that if we are to succeed in this great struggle we must mobilize and utilize every resource of the Republic; that, if the world is to be made safe for democracy and if Anglo-Saxon civilization is to be preserved, we must not fail in any direction or at any time to make the winning of the war the business of the Nation and the business as well of every one of its citizens.

But, Mr. President, it has been well said that this is not a war of armies, but a war of peoples; not a conflict between military forces, but a conflict between the industrial, social, moral, political, and military elements of all the nations engaged in it. Germany's successes have been quite as much due to her recognition of that mighty fact as to the superior excellence of her armies. Her conquest of Russia was not effected by her legions, but by her propagandist policy, which began years ago, and which has been developed with a fiendish perfection, so that when the hour came, it could be utilized for Russia's destruction. We must carry on a similar warfare.

We must also remember that the man upon the farm, the boy at school, the workman in the shop, the constructor of war materials, is as much a factor, each is as much a soldier enlisted in this great conflict and performing his duty as fully as though he were in the trenches at the front; and that, unless he continues to perform that service, the man in the trenches can not perform his duty there.

I believe, Mr. President, in some draft system which will take under governmental supervision the man power of the country, not so much for the purpose of increasing our armies, but for the purpose of increasing the forces in our factories and upon our farms.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] has introduced and has several times advocated a measure of that sort. I believe it is his intention to offer it as an amendment to this bill. That, Mr. President, in my judgment, is the sort of amendment to the draft law which the present exigency requires.

The men who strike in the factories, the men who fail to work their eight hours a day and to give the Government or their employer due consideration, and therefore the men who interfere with the general progress of development and of production in this country, should be under the military arm of the Government and be subject to the infliction of the military code just as much as the soldier who wears the uniform of his Government and who stands before the hail of bullets of the enemy. So believing, Mr. President, I am unable to support this amendment. I do not believe that it is necessary at this time.

It has been stated here that more than 200,000 young men under the age of 21 and over the age of 18 are in the Army as volunteers. One of the predictions made of the conscript law, one of the things which, in theory at least, it sought to do away with, was that system of volunteering which deprived the Nation of the best and most enthusiastic blood of its youth and depleted the country of its finest material of young men; yet it appears that, notwithstanding the conscript law, the volunteer system is quite as effective as it was before we had a conscript law, and that, instead of being a substitute for, it is merely a supplement to that old and better volunteer system which, supported by patriotism, like hope, "springs eternal in the human breast," and marches in the great human army which in a Republic may always be relied upon when the Government needs the services of its citizens.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The volunteers who have been mentioned are young men who went into the National Guard system before the draft law was enacted; so that the volunteers in the service now have probably reached the age limit, unless some go into the new National Guard organization which is now provided for.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator from Oregon is mistaken in the statement that they all enlisted in the National Guard before the draft law was enacted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Practically they all were.

Mr. THOMAS. The draft law, as I remember—the Senator from Oregon will correct me if I am wrong—expressly recognized the right of volunteering between the ages of 18 and 45 in the Regular Army and in the National Guard.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think so.

Mr. THOMAS. I know personally of many instances where men less than 21 years of age did volunteer in the National Army after that law was passed.

I am not finding fault with that law, Mr. President. I opposed it conscientiously and unsuccessfully, but since its adoption it has had my undivided and constant support. I think, however, it is well enough to call attention to the fact that, inasmuch as it does permit volunteering, we shall get, as we have got, plenty of volunteers, the most of them beneath but many of them above the age limitation.

Mr. President, this is too important a matter, in my judgment, for Congress to pass upon affirmatively as an amendment to the military appropriation bill. It is a question of Nation-wide importance; it is one which affects every calling, every man with the age, the family of every man within the age, and every industry and pursuit of the Nation. It is a matter which should be made the subject of a separate bill just as much as the draft law was made the subject of a separate bill. It should be introduced as a separate item of legislation; it should be considered by the appropriate committee; we should have the best information that can be acquired from the highest military sources. We should also inquire the extent to which our industries may be affected. Then, with that wealth of information before us, coupled with such recommendations as the administration may see fit to make, we can act wisely, intelligently, and permanently.

Of course, there has been a good deal of discussion both official and unofficial regarding the raising of the age limit. I am quite aware of the sentiment of Gen. Crowder regarding it; and I wish, Mr. President, to add my own to the encomiums which have here been pronounced upon the work of that splendid officer. He has discharged the duties which the Executive called upon him in a time of great stress to administer, and he has wisely, efficiently, and successfully administered a great military law. Under it he has built up a magnificent Army, and is entitled to the highest praise that a grateful Nation can bestow; but, Mr. President, we must remember, nevertheless, that it is a part of the military training to urge increases in the Army and increases of the limits of service. A soldier would hardly be a soldier if he did not develop such an attribute. The general wants a large Army; his reasons may be of the best; I am not criticizing them; I merely state the tendency of all things military toward a larger and a yet larger establishment; indeed, if I had the time, I believe I could demonstrate that this war was due to the expansion of that spirit, beginning perhaps in low degree, but so developing itself as finally to engulf a great people, and convert a great empire from one of the finest monuments of modern civilization to the most brutal and dominating force ever known to man. But even he, Mr. President, so far as I am aware—and I am now referring to Gen. Crowder—even he has not been before the Senate committee, nor do I think before the committee of the other House, urging upon them or upon us an immediate consideration and enactment of this measure or anything like it.

So that we only have unofficially his view; which, however correct it may be, is not sufficient, in my mind, to justify us in affirmatively passing upon this very important amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I present a proposed amendment to the bill and ask to have it printed. I wish to say in reference to it that I expect to offer it as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

In further explanation, I desire to say that we seem to be confronted in this bill with the need of amending our draft law in order to comply with the desires and relieve the embarrassments of the Department of State. The present draft law provides for the drafting not only of American citizens but of those aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens. When an alien of Great Britain or Italy or France has declared his intention to become an American citizen and is drafted, there is no objection to that on the part of his country; but when we attempt to draft the citizens or subjects of neutral countries we have been confronted with the fact that we are violating treaties, and to some extent are violating international comity. The representatives of those countries have appealed to the State Department in thousands of cases to secure immunity for those declarants. It seems to be necessary, therefore, in order to relieve the State Department of that embarrassment, to amend the law by giving absolute immunity to these declarants. At the present time the War Department, under the interpretation of Gen. Crowder, has construed the act of Congress as repealing the treaties, and although the State Department is unable to take that view of it, so long as the War Department holds that view and sends these men to Europe against their will and in spite of protests we are likely to be embroiled in very serious embarrassment. I think, therefore, we must amend the law.

In the amendment I propose that where the declarant is drafted and sets up his immunity he shall be at once released; but when he is released under those circumstances his declaration to become an American citizen is automatically canceled and recalled, and he can never thereafter become a citizen of the United States. I have inserted that provision with the idea that that will restrain men from setting up the claim of immunity, and if they do set it up they will lose their right to become American citizens. I come from a State in which there are a good many so-called declarants—that is, men who have declared their intention to become citizens—and it would cause a good deal of ill feeling and a good deal of indignation on the part of American citizens whose sons are subjected to the draft to have their neighbors released from the draft and to stay at home to do the voting while their sons go to the war.

I therefore am going to offer this amendment—I hope it will not come up until to-morrow, and in the meantime it can be printed—as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico. In it I have placed the ages from 20 to 40 years, with the impression that I can in that way concur with the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if his amendment is of much length?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; and I shall be glad to have it read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have it read if it is not a long amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. FALL, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the second sentence of section 2 of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, be amended to read as follows:

"Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens between the ages of 20 and 40 years, both inclusive, and also such male residents of the United States as are the nationals of countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war or are the nationals of countries neutral in the present war and have declared their intention to become citizens and failed to assert any claim to immunity as foreign nationals: Provided, however, If such claim to ammunity is asserted, it shall be recognized and shall operate automatically as a withdrawal and cancellation of the declaration to become an American citizen, and the individual shall forever be debarred from becoming one."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, some figures have been given this afternoon that ought to be corrected. The country has been misled often enough by loose and flamboyant figures. I read the other day a statement made by a Representative in Congress as to the number of fighting planes we had on the other side which had no relation whatever to the facts. Statements have been made this afternoon that we can draw an army of eight or nine million men from those who are now within the draft age, and the impression would go to the country that all we have to do is to keep calling men just as we are calling them now, and we can have eight or nine million men out of those within the draft age. If the Senate will bear with me a moment I will give them the best figures obtainable, and Senators will be astounded, I think, at the smallness of the Army we are to have from those now covered by military draft law.

Mr. President, the total number of men who were registered and who were required to file questionnaires was 8,689,447. They were placed in five classes. Class 1 included 2,428,729 men; class 2, 509,666; class 3, 427,870; class 4, 3,483,326; and class 5, 1,839,856.

What are those classes? Those embraced in class 1 are as follows:

A. Single man without dependent relatives.
B. Married man, with or without children, or father of motherless children, who has habitually failed to support his family.
C. Married man dependent on wife for support.
D. Married man, with or without children, or father of motherless children; man not usefully engaged, family supported by income independent of his labor.
E. Unskilled farm laborer.
F. Unskilled industrial laborer.
Registrant by or in respect of whom no deferred classification is claimed or made.
Registrant who fails to submit questionnaire and in respect of whom no deferred classification is claimed or made.
All registrants not included in any other division in this schedule.

That is class 1, and you will observe that it is very broad. I come now to class 2:

A. Married man with children or father of motherless children, where such wife or children or such motherless children are not mainly dependent upon his labor for support for the reason that there are other reasonably certain sources of adequate support (excluding earnings or possible earnings from the labor of the wife), available, and that the removal of the registrant will not deprive such dependents of support.
B. Married man, without children, whose wife, although the registrant is engaged in a useful occupation, is not mainly dependent upon his labor for support, for the reason that the wife is skilled in some special class of work which she is physically able to perform and in which she is employed, or in which there is an immediate opening for her under conditions that will enable her to support herself decently and without suffering or hardship.
C. Necessary skilled farm laborer in necessary agricultural enterprise.
D. Necessary skilled industrial laborer in necessary industrial enterprise.

It is getting pretty dangerous when you begin to take the skilled industrial labor and the skilled agricultural labor, and it is getting to be a pretty great hardship when you take the married man with children, and take him simply because there may be some other means of support outside of him, not in the way of his fortune, but from some other source; and it is getting to be a very great hardship when you take the husband of the wife because she can go out and get a job and go to work.

Now I come to class 3:

A. Man with dependent children (not his own), but toward whom he stands in relation of parent.
B. Man with dependent aged or infirm parents.
C. Man with dependent helpless brothers or sisters.
D. County or municipal officer.
E. Highly trained fireman or policeman, at least 3 years in service of municipality.
F. Necessary customhouse clerk.
G. Necessary employee of United States in transmission of the mails.
H. Necessary artificer or workman in United States armory or arsenal.
I. Necessary employee in service of United States.
J. Necessary assistant, associate, or hired manager of necessary agricultural enterprise.
K. Necessary highly specialized technical or mechanical expert of necessary industrial enterprise.
L. Necessary assistant or associate manager of necessary industrial enterprise.

Mr. President, you can not take those men, or any one of those classes of men, without striking at the very roots of our production which is essential to the war.

Now, I read class 4:

A. Man whose wife or children are mainly dependent on his labor for support.
B. Mariner actually employed in sea service of citizen or merchant in the United States.
C. Necessary sole managing, controlling, or directing head of necessary agricultural enterprise.
D. Necessary sole managing, controlling, or directing head of necessary industrial enterprise.

Why, when you go out and take the heads of the great factories and skilled labor, what will remain to back up our armies in the field?

Now, see how far class 5 reaches:

A. Officers—legislative, executive, or judicial of the United States or of State, Territory, or District of Columbia.
B. Regular or duly ordained minister of religion.
C. Student who on May 18, 1917, was preparing for ministry in recognized school.
D. Persons in military or naval service of United States.
E. Alien enemy.
F. Resident alien (not an enemy) who claims exemption.
G. Person totally and permanently physically or mentally unfit for military service.
H. Person morally unfit to be a soldier of the United States.
I. Licensed pilot actually employed in the pursuit of his vocation.

Out of the 2,428,729 men in class 1 certain deductions must be made of delinquents, Emergency Fleet employees, limited-service men, remediable defectives, and cases pending and not physically examined on date of last report; so that we now find that there has actually been called out under the 1917 registration a total of 1,575,572 men to date, and there remains yet uncalled in class 1 of the draft 475,000 men who will be called some time between now and the middle of September, making a total of 2,050,572 men, or the whole of class 1, who will be called by the middle of September, this year. From the date of the first registration, June 5, 1917, to June 5, 1918, there were 740,000 men who became of age and registered. Out of this number it is estimated that 400,000 can be called to the colors. In addition to this we have an army composed of the National Guard and enlisted men of 800,000, making a grand total of 3,350,572 men in our Army when all available men in class 1 of the drafts have been called.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator in his calculations considered the wastage that is constantly going on?

Mr. REED. I have not considered the wastage. Of course, any great battle might make a difference. I am simply speaking of the total. I am not taking into account deaths. It is the best military opinion that none of the classes except class 1 should be touched. They embrace the married men who are heads of families and have families dependent upon them. They embrace the men who are engaged in the management of great factories and institutions essential to the war. They likewise embrace those skilled workmen who must be kept in the shops of the country in order that we may produce enough for the war. In other words, they embrace a class of men that the best military opinion holds are essential to the industries of our country, or else they are the heads of families actually supporting their wives and children, and hence, if taken, the wives and children will become a charge upon the country. So that, counting this matter up and reducing it to figures as nearly as I am able to do in a somewhat hasty examination of figures which are accurate, we are about in this situation:

We have from the present draft, and will have from the draft when we have exhausted all of class 1, approximately 2,600,000 drafted troops. We will have from other sources—that is, the National Guard, the Regular Army, and so forth—approximately 800,000 men; so that we will have an Army of approximately 3,400,000 men, and then the present draft will have been exhausted, unless we go into classes 2, 3, 4, and 5, which it is thought ought not to be called.

The object of my observations thus far is simply and only to get accurate figures before the Senate and let us have done with this—I will not say nonsense—but this mistaken idea of boastfully saying to the world that America can raise out of her present draft eight or nine million troops. That can not be done practically. If we are going to raise an Army much beyond 3,400,000 men, then we must either go into classes 2, 3, 4, and 5 or we must extend the age limit, either raising it up or lowering it down, or extending it in both directions.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Where are these figures taken from? I was not in the Chamber when the Senator began his speech.

Mr. REED. I was asked not to disclose the exact source of them. I will say that they are correct.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Are they official figures from the Judge Advocate General's Department? The only reason why I ask the question is that Gen. Crowder has just made the statement to me that the entire strength of the Army will be two million and a half of men in three months, and I am surprised at the Senator's statement that it will be 3,400,000.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to give the Senator, in confidence, the source of my information. It has been suggested to me that the mistake may come in this way: My figures of 3,400,000 include the Regular Army, the Volunteers, the National Guard, and then include all that we have obtained by the draft or those that we will get from the draft unless we invade classes 2, 3, 4, and 5.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a further question, assuming that the same rules of physical qualification are enforced as to the lower classes, how large an Army could we raise?

Mr. REED. From the other classes?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. REED. I could not answer that. I assume that the other classes are no more physically unfit than the class that we have spoken of.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Did the Senator say, in the course of his remarks—I had to leave the Chamber—how many men are in the Army now?

Mr. REED. Yes; that is included.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator say what the number is?

Mr. REED. Yes; I can say to the Senator approximately. You will have 3,400,000 in September, and if you will take out of that the 875,000 that are yet to be called under the old and new drafts you will have substantially the present Army. The Senator can make the subtraction himself.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then I understand that that is the limit of our increment, certainly within the year?

Mr. REED. Yes.

These figures have been handed to me in the Senate Chamber. I have not had time to digest them, and I apologize for taking so many words to present a matter that I could have placed before the Senate in shorter compass if I had had a little time to collate my facts. But I rose only to submit these figures in order that we might get our feet on the ground and know what we are talking about, and quit talking about eight or nine million men within the draft age, just like we ought to quit talking about 3,000 airplanes on the front. If we had 3,000 good fighting airplanes on the front at this time, the Germans would be in retreat. If we had 500 great fighting Caproni machines on the Italian front, the probabilities are that the Austrian troops would retreat entirely from Italian territory, and likely enough the Austrian Empire would fall to pieces, because men who know say that a few bombing machines over the capital of Austria would break the morale of that people at the present crisis. We do not have them, and we do not have them because there has been a good deal of talk about flying machines that have never flown and never will fly except in the imagination of gentlemen who have been entertaining the country with dreams.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me how many we have?

Mr. REED. I can not tell the Senator accurately. We have a very small number, with a very large number coming on, I am happy to say; but we have no bombing planes at present. That, however, is another matter, and I do not want to go into it, because the committee has been investigating it, and I wish to let them report.

So I think the problem that is now confronting us is this: Are we content at this time to allow the law to remain so that the maximum of our Army next fall will not exceed 3,400,000, and so that when that time shall have arrived—which is only 60 to 90 days from now—we will then be without any law under which any other troops can be drawn, unless we go into classes 2, 3, 4, and 5? And then if we do desire a larger Army than 3,400,000 to be constructed by that time, or to be in process of construction by that time, is it better to increase that number by changing the age limit or is it better to go into these classes 2, 3, 4, and 5 in order to get the additional number? Let us assume that we ought to have an additional Army in creation of 1,000,000 men—that is, 1,000,000 more than the 3,400,000—and that we ought to be preparing now for that. The problem then would be, Shall we get that from classes 2, 3, 4, and 5 or would we better get it by changing the age limit? Which will be the greatest injury to the country? Which will give us the best Army? Which will involve the least expense?

We do not have the figures, or, at least, I do not have them in my possession, as to the number of men unmarried and without dependents between the ages of 30 and 40; but it does seem to me that it would be very much better to call the unmarried men without dependents between the ages of 30 and 40 than it would to call the men from classes 2, 3, 4, and 5. I think, therefore, that we ought to take time and get the information and know what we are doing, and not guess at it.

Mr. President, I do not believe it is wise for us to take men out of the industries of this country faster than we can take them into the Army, digest them—if I may use that term—and transport them. I agree in a large measure that the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] along that line were very wise. That is undoubtedly true. It would be a mere wastage to take a lot of men from industries where they are needed to put them out in military camps and keep them there if they can not be there utilized. That, of course, is true; but, Mr. President, what are the facts?

Let us take the question of transportation. The fact is that every 30 days we are sending about 200,000 troops to Europe. If we have the boats to do that now, we will have as large a number of boats in the future. We hope by this time that we have overtaken the destruction of the submarine, so that the production is equal to the destruction, and that in a very short time the production will outrun the destruction, so that our ability to transport troops must be on the increase; and yet, at the rate of present transportation, we shall have sent our entire Army abroad in a very few months of time. In a very few months of time, therefore, we can transport more troops; and the question that we ought to be considering, it seems to me, in all solemnity, is the creation of additional troops if they are going to be necessary. The preliminary steps ought to be taken. There should be no time lost. There should be no interregnum between the completion of the present draft, the creation of the present army, and the bringing into the service of additional troops in such numbers as may be necessary to meet the great emergency that now confronts the world.

I am heartsick—and I say this with as much sorrow as I ever said anything in my life—when I contemplate what has been done, at the frightful chances that we have taken by reason of being behindhand with our work. We are behindhand in many respects. There is no use in complaining about a thing that is water over the dam. The question is, What are we to do in the future? If we had proceeded according to the best possible means we would have had airplanes in large numbers before this time; we would have had more ordnance before this time; we would have had many more things in the nature of necessary equipment, and I believe every man in the Senate will agree that those mistakes never ought to be repeated. I say this without any bitterness, without any desire to criticize anybody. They are the mistakes that other countries have made. They may be mistakes that are almost incident in a situation, and yet we ought to avoid them in the future.

So far as I am concerned, I am thoroughly convinced of the fact that if the United States is to emerge from this war with honor, with a glorious victory that will in part compensate for the fearful price in blood and treasure we are compelled to pay, the sooner we get men and metal in overwhelming amounts upon the European battle fields the sooner the struggle will be over and the less will be the expense. While I do not want to force my views upon the War Department, and recognize that it would be useless for me to attempt to do so, I do believe that the Congress of the United States is warranted in so amending this law that the President may, in his discretion, call for troops as rapidly as they can be absorbed into the great Military Establishment and transformed into soldiers.

In this connection I cite a fact that is so well known that it can not be regarded as a military secret. Many troops are being sent to Europe to-day with a very short course of training. That I do not criticize, because I believe we ought to do it, but I regret that we have to do it. I hope that we will keep on collecting troops in these cantonments and training the troops, so that when our men go across they will go well fitted for the task that is before them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is an able member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I want to know for my own satisfaction whether the War Department has sent any estimates or whether he has from any source an estimate sent to the committee stating how many men there ought to be and what the ages ought to be?

Mr. REED. The only way I can answer that question with propriety, I think, is to say this: There seems to be an opinion on the part of some of our officers that for the present we do not need any increase; that until we have absorbed all the men in class 1, at least, we do not need to amend the law. Mr. President, one of the officers who has been most persistent in that opinion is no more a military man than the Members of this body. I do not reflect upon him at all; I entertain for him a very great respect; but he has made mistakes in the past. He will make some in the future. We all make mistakes. As far as I am concerned, I am utterly unwilling to see the creation of this Army cease on the 15th day of next September with an Army of only 3,400,000 total. If we are going to need more men after the 15th day of next September, it is now late enough to begin calling them. We can scarcely get out the papers between now and the 15th day of next September to call the men for a new draft which might be authorized to-day. It seems to me that there is going to be a great lapse here. This is a grave situation.

Let me say this to the Senate in conclusion; let me appeal to your judgment on this point: Before we had sent a soldier to Europe, if the battle over there had gone against us, we could have lined our troops and massed our cannon on our own shores and stood here and fought the Huns forever and a day. Even if all Europe collapsed we could have defended ourselves, I believe, against all kinds of attack. Therefore until we sent our soldiers the issue was different from that which is presented to-day.

Now, we have 900,000 of our boys in Europe, and every one of them is a hostage for victory. If the European line should be broken, if a great disaster should befall, if these 900,000 men of ours should be killed or captured, then we can not stand on our shores and defy Germany. The injury has already been irremediable and our boys would be captives in German prison pens. They are our hostages for an effort that will exhaust all the resources of this country. Back of them we are pledged by our action, our fortunes, and our lives and all that we possess. Having put 900,000 men in this position of peril, I deem it my duty to do all that lies within my power to see to it that they are backed up not by sentiment, not by speeches, not by bombast, but by other men and other guns and other ships, so that they shall be secure because of their numbers and invincible because they represent the strength of the entire Nation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator has referred to the time that will be required in the preparation of papers. I should like to ask the Senator whether if this amendment should be adopted as it is now framed the men coming within the new ages would be considered as acceptable as the men within the present draft age?

Mr. REED. I assume that those within the present draft are already registered. There will be a registration of the new men.

That I may not be misunderstood, let me state that I do not want to be understood as advocating, in what I said, the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico. I do advocate some extension of the draft.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator from Missouri will yield to me for a moment, or if my colleague will yield to me——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I simply rose to ask the question, and perhaps my colleague can answer it.

Mr. FALL. I can answer it very definitely. Under the rule I have a right at least to perfect my amendment. If I am recognized for that purpose, or in the time of my colleague and he yields for that purpose, I shall ask leave to perfect the pending amendment by striking out in line 2 the word "eighteen" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty"; in line 3 by striking out the word "five," after the word "forty," and striking out all of line 4, so that it will read:

Provided, That the age limit fixed in said act is hereby changed and shall be, and is hereby, fixed at 20 and 40 years in lieu of 21 and 31.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask my colleague if that would permit the exhaustion of the present age limit before bringing in the additional ages. In other words, I ask my colleague whether the adoption of this amendment would bring about a confusion in the operation of the present law as applied to the present ages.

Mr. FALL. It could not bring about any confusion. It would simply increase the number of men under 21 in class 1 and over 31 in class 1.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me? In making those changes in his proposed amendment does the Senator strike out the proviso?

Mr. FALL. I strike out the proviso entirely. I will say that I do that after hearing the debate and after consultation with a large number of Senators, including the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought of offering an amendment in the exact terms of the Senator's amendment as amended, but I shall not offer it.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 6, at the end of the line, insert "but those between the ages of 19 and 21, exclusive, shall be called for education or training, nonmilitary, military, or both, or for other forms of noncombatant national service during a portion or all of each year."

Mr. KING. I offer an amendment, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MARTIN. I present a report of the conferees on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and ask for its adoption.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10358) "making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"The minimum of daily hours of labor required of all clerks and other employees of the several executive departments and independent establishments, prescribed by section 7 of the act of March 15, 1898, as amended, is increased during the period of the existing war from seven hours to eight hours under the same authority and conditions specified in the said act as amended."

And the Senate agree to the same.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
O. W. UNDERWOOD,
F. E. WARREN,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
JOHN M. EVANS,
WILLIAM H. STAFFORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations? I understand that the Senate conferees agreed to the House provision relating to the extension of the working time for clerks to eight hours.

Mr. MARTIN. They did, and it made an eight-hour day. The House insisted on that, and in order to reach an agreement and to have this bill passed, which it is vitally important shall go into effect the 1st of July, the Senate conferees receded on that amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a matter of regret to me that the Senate conferees felt obliged, as I understand they did feel obliged, to do so, or possibly lose the bill, and that they agreed to the so-called Borland amendment. I think it is a mistake, but under the circumstances I take it for granted it could not be avoided.

Mr. MARTIN. I fully agree with the Senator. We have to make concessions in order to accomplish legislation, and we did recede from that amendment of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., Tuesday, June 25, 1918) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 26, 1918, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 25, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our hearts go out in gratitude to Thee, our Father in heaven, for the deep and abiding patriotism which has ever characterized the American people and which insures the perpetuity of our Republic; for the alacrity with which our young men have sprung to the call of the colors in this hour of danger.

Encourage, strengthen, and maintain them, with our allies, that victory may crown their efforts and bring a lasting peace to the weary, worn world, and all praise shall be Thine, in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RANK OF MEDICAL OFFICERS.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for not to exceed three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for not to exceed three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I notice in this morning's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the principal committee amendment to the Army appropriation bill adopted in the Senate yesterday is that straightening out the dispute over the lack of rank in the Medical Corps of the Army. Substantially it contains the provisions of the Owen bill.

Complaint has been made that because of the inferior rank among medical officers they were unable to compel obedience to their orders affecting sanitation and health. Under the amendment adopted yesterday one additional major general and three additional brigadier generals are allowed to the Medical Corps of the Regular Army and three major generals and six brigadier generals provided for the Medical Corps for each million men of the National Army.

It is often said, and truly so, that this is a war of science and experts; therefore let us hope that the death rate from disease in this war shall be reduced from what it was in our past wars, especially the Spanish-American War, which is still fresh in our minds, in which we lost 14 men from disease where we lost 1 from bullets.

Without minimizing for a moment the splendor of Japan's victories on land or sea—Mukden, Port Arthur, Liaoyang, and the Corean Strait—of which two are among the bloodiest battles in history, it remains true that the greatest conquests of Japan have been in the humanities of war and the stopping of the needless sacrifice of life through preventable diseases. Longmore's Tables, which are accepted as reliable statistics of war, and which are based upon the record of battles for the past 200 years, show that there rarely has been a conflict of any great duration in which at least four men have not perished from disease to every one from bullets. All the statistics of the past were studied with the minutest care and detail by the Japanese. Their authorities recognized that in order to be victorious over a foe like Russia this great silent enemy that slaughtered 80 out of every 100 that fell had to be overcome. Japan sent her students all over the world to study army systems in every land. With the knowledge thus gathered she evolved a system of her own. The result was shown after their war with Russia. Japan lost in killed and died from wounds 52,946; died from all diseases, 11,992; more than four deaths from bullets to one from disease as against a record of centuries of four from disease to one from bullets, or 800 per cent better than the average of history. Only 1.2 per cent of the entire army died of sickness or disease. Only 1.5 per cent died of gunshot wounds, although 20 per cent were wounded. This record, I believe, is unparalleled in the annals of history.

This should be a lesson for us in this war, and we can do as well, if not better, provided our medical officers have more executive and less advisory privileges in matters of hygiene and sanitation in barracks and field. In Great Britain they have given very much more important recognition to the officers in the medical department, and the same thing is true with regard to France and Italy. This legislation is not only in the interest of the soldiers, but it is also a recognition of the valuable services rendered by the medical fraternity and in keeping with the high purposes and efficiency of the profession. I therefore trust that when this matter comes before the House it will receive careful and due consideration and that the amendment will be enacted into law.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 12441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair announced the following conferees: Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, and Mr. MONDELL.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 19, 1918:

S. 4445. An act granting the consent of Congress to Marion and Horry Counties, S. C., to construct a bridge across Little Peedee River.

On June 20, 1918:

H. R. 11284. An act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 10843. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 11658. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 9641. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 10924. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 9506. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 12441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SENATE RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the following resolution (S. Res. 266) was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 24, 1918.

Whereas H. R. 9248, a bill "To prevent extortion, to impose taxes upon certain incomes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," duly passed by the House of Representatives March 12, 1918, was considered in the Senate and passed with a reported amendment in the nature of a substitute May 11, 1918; and
Whereas on said May 11, 1918, a conference was asked and managers on the part of the Senate were appointed thereon; and
Whereas on June 14, 1918, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives called said bill from the Speaker's table, and made thereon certain remarks seriously reflecting upon the honor and integrity of the Senate, as appears on pages 8452 to 8457 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and
Whereas subsequently on said June 14, 1918, managers were appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, of whom said chairman of said committee was one; and
Whereas said chairman of said House committee subsequently sent to each manager on the part of the Senate under date of June 19, 1918, the following letter:

"COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
"Washington, D. C., June 19, 1918.

"DEAR SIR: I write to advise you that on the 14th instant the House agreed to the request made by the Senate for a conference on H. R. 9248, the antiprofiteering rent bill, and that Messrs. CROSSER, of Ohio; CARY, of Wisconsin; and myself were appointed conferees on the part of the House. And further, to advise you that we will meet the Senate conferees at such time and place that will be most agreeable to the Senate conferees.

"In order to facilitate matters I am inviting the attention of each of the Senate conferees to some of the more important questions of difference which will arise in conference by sending in advance a list of questions inquiring as to the attitude of the Senate conferees concerning each. The questions mentioned are herewith inclosed.

"Very truly, yours,

(Signed) "BEN JOHNSON.

"1. Are you unalterable in your purpose to create a rent administrator?

"2. If so, are you unalterable in your purpose not to intrust the work with anyone unless he be a resident of the District of Columbia?

"3. Are you unalterable in your purpose not to permit the President to select a rent administrator for the District of Columbia just as he selected a Food Administrator and Fuel Administrator, i. e., without your consent and approval?

"4. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose to permit profiteering in house rents by imposing a fine less than the amount of the profiteering, or will you accept some plan like that recently suggested by the President in his message to Congress, whereby all the money taken in a profiteering transaction shall be surrendered?

"5. Are you unalterable in your adherence to that part of the Senate bill which would compel the tenant to leave his work as often and as long as it would be necessary for him to leave it in order to prosecute or defend the several appeals allowed?

"6. Are you unalterable in your purpose not to fix a gross return to the landlord, but instead to give him a 'net' return, notwithstanding the fact that thereby the landlord would have no interest whatever in keeping down the operating expenses of the premises?

"7. Are you unalterable in your purpose to saddle upon the tenant the cost of permanent street and similar improvements to the real estate alone, notwithstanding the fact that the erstwhile tenant enjoys the building alone?

"8. Are you unalterable in your purpose to compel the tenant to account for 'vacancies' in the house and 'depreciation' of the house; and not allow himself to offset that by the growing increase in the value of the land upon which the house stands?

"9. Are you unalterable in your purpose to permit a landlord to profiteer with a business house because it may once have been used as a residence?

"10. Are you unalterable in your purpose to fasten the present annual rates of rental on the tenant by fixing the rates in effect on the 1st day of last October as a basis?

"11. Are you unalterable in your purpose that the rental for furniture shall be as much as 30 per cent of its value?

"12. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose not to punish profiteering corporations to the same extent that you would individuals who profiteer?

"13. Are you unalterable in your seeming purpose to exempt 'the original landlord' from all the provisions of the bill by your definition of 'landlord'?

"14. If you are unalterable in your seeming purpose to adhere to the remedy of 'fine' instead of that of 'taxation,' as set out in the bill passed by the House, would you be in favor of having a fine levied on all those who violate any provision of the act, or would you insist upon limiting it to those only who 'evade or attempt to evade its provisions'?"

And
Whereas on June 21, 1918, said chairman of said House committee sent to each of the managers on the part of the Senate the following letter:

"COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
"Washington, D. C., June 21, 1918.

"To the SENATE CONFEREES ON H. R. 9248
(the antiprofiteering rent bill),
"Washington, D. C.

"GENTLEMEN: The Washington newspapers of yesterday contained the statement that at least some of the Senate conferees on the antiprofiteering rent bill contemplated having me denied the privileges of the Senate floor because of the criticism made by me of the Senate amendment which has come to be known as the 'Pomerene bill.'

"I do not care a continental about that—run along and get through with it, and then permit the Senate to vote on a measure that will prevent the profiteers from driving nearly a thousand war workers out of Washington every week. I am not interested in the least in your undertaking to deny me the privileges of the Senate Chamber, but I am deeply concerned for the war worker, who is being robbed and then sent out of Washington, and because of which our boys in France must suffer.

"The newspaper articles referred to state also that at least some of the Senate conferees may decline to go into conference because I am one of the House conferees. May I not suggest that by such a course, either intentionally or unintentionally, you play right into the hands of the profiteers, as delay in the passage of a good bill is what they seek?

"May I not also suggest that your skins should be thicker or your bill better? I not only invite the severest criticism of all my official acts, but I am quite anxious, indeed, to have the acid test applied to my endeavors in this particular matter, and you will not only not offend me but you will do me a favor by wading into both me and it without gloves, since I, and not the landlords, am its author.

"This is not a time for 'senatorial dignity' but one for action. Rearing back on your 'pastern joints' don't get the oppressed tenants anything. I do not intend to permit your attitude toward me, because of my criticism of your 'rotten' bill, to in the least deter me in my efforts to prevent the profiteer from fattening off of your country's needs.

"Your amendment—the Pomerene bill—had to be criticized, 'senatorial dignity' to the contrary notwithstanding.

"My contempt for such of you as may resort to pretext to evade full responsibility for not giving our war workers protection from the miserable profiteers is just as great as yours may be for me; but, as I said, that shall not stop me from following my plain duty in the premises.

"Let us get to work on the bill, and then you can have your revenge on me to your hearts' content. You have my full consent to deny me the privileges of the Senate Chamber, or even to take your spite out of my hide, if you will only go ahead and let the Senate vote on a good bill instead of a subterfuge.

"While I am sending this letter to each of the conferees, it is really intended for those only who are responsible for the article in yesterday afternoon's local newspapers.

"Very truly, yours,

(Signed) "BEN JOHNSON."

And
Whereas on June 22, 1918, the said chairman of said House committee presented the foregoing letters to the House of Representatives, and in presenting them used the following language:

"I take it for granted that the thought of 'ousting' me from the Senate Chamber is the result of a close association with those who have been 'ousting' the Government workers from houses in the District of Columbia."

Therefore be it

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the Senate on said bill be, and they are hereby, excused from further service as such conferees until otherwise ordered by the Senate; and that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the House of Representatives.

Attest: JAMES M. BAKER, Secretary.

To the Committee on the District of Columbia.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for not to exceed two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it for the purpose of reading something or for really speaking?

Mr. RAKER. I expect to do both.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

OMNIBUS PENSION BILLS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I call up conference reports on the bills H. R. 9506, 9641, 10843, 10924, and 11658, all bills granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up the conference reports on the several omnibus pension bills mentioned by him. The Clerk will read the conference reports.

The conference reports were severally read and severally agreed to, as follows:

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (S. 4542) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors. This bill has been on the calendar for about a month. Last Friday a week ago was pension day on the Private Calendar in the House, and our committee gave way in order that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] might consider his appropriation bill. I would like very much to have this and other bills considered at this time, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4542, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman asked unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of John W. Ferris, late chaplain, Sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The committee amendment is as follows:

Page 2, strike out lines 9 to 11, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Roswell B. Van Wagenen, late of Company E, Third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 19, strike out "$20" and insert "$17."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Barnard J. Irwin, late of Company C, Third Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Laura A. Workman, widow of Eddy J. Workman, late of Battery I, First Regiment United States Artillery, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month, and $2 per month additional on account of each of the minor children of said Eddy J. Workman until they reach the age of 16 years.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 3, strike out lines 4 to 13, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Orval W. Hiatt, late of Company E, Fortieth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 3, line 20, strike out "$20" and insert "$12."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Agnes Swarts, widow of John L. Swarts, late of U. S. S. Independence, United States Navy, Regular Establishment, and pay her a pension at the rate of $17 per month, and $2 per month additional on account of each of the minor children of said John L. Swarts until they reach the age of 16 years.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 4, strike out lines 1 to 6, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, at that juncture I offered an amendment a while ago which was not in order at that time, which amendment was to restore that item. I sent a copy of it to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, lines 1 to 10, insert the matter stricken out by the committee amendment, which reads as follows:

"The name of Agnes Swarts, widow of John L. Swarts, late of U. S. S. Independence, United States Navy, Regular Establishment, and pay her a pension at the rate of $17 per month, and $2 per month additional on account of each of the minor children of said John L. Swarts until they reach the age of 16 years."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the proper procedure would be to vote down the committee amendment. You do not have to move to insert that. The committee has reported this bill with an amendment striking out the first item on page 4, and now I understand the gentleman from Ohio desires to have that item retained in the bill. The proper procedure would be to vote down the committee amendment. It is not proper to move to insert again in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the proceedings by which that amendment was agreed to be vacated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Now the question is on the amendment adopted a while ago.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Mary Howard, widow of George Howard, late of Battery M, Fourth Regiment United States Artillery, Regular Establishment, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 4, strike out lines 7 to 10, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Ada Johnston Cowles, widow of Walter Cleveland Cowles, late rear admiral, United States Navy, Regular Establishment, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 5, line 4, strike out "$50" and insert "$25."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Florence M. Anderson, widow of James L. Anderson, late captain Company L, One hundred and sixty-first Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 5, strike out lines 5 to 8, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Ellen H. Sharp, widow of Frederick D. Sharp, late captain, Twentieth Regiment United States Infantry, Regular Establishment, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 5, line 15, strike out "$25" and insert "$20."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of George W. Goodman, late of Capt. Robert Porter's company California Volunteers, California Indian War, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 5, strike out lines 16 to 19, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Lanson O. Brown, late of Company H, First Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 5, strike out lines 24 and 25, and lines 1 and 2, page 6.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of David M. Thompson, late of Company E, Forty-fourth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 7, line 4, strike out "$20" and insert "$12."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman got any more bills?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I have three other bills to call up.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. GARRETT of Texas, leave of absence was granted to his colleague Mr. GREGG indefinitely, on account of illness in the family.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 3798.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman asks unanimous consent, I presume?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 3798.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 3798. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire whether this is another omnibus pension bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. My inquiry is, What is the occasion of the gentleman calling it up on a day other than the day reserved for pension bills?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. These bills are Senate bills and have been on the calendar for four or five weeks. A week ago last Friday was pension day on the Private Calendar. The Committee on Pensions gave way in order that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] might take up an appropriation bill, with the understanding that we could bring this in at any time next week when there was not some important war measure on. I ask unanimous consent to take up this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not consider the census bill an important war measure?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I take it that every Member——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the private calendar.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 3798. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. May I inquire of the chairman—on page 8, line 3, there is a denial of a pension to Mrs. Cottman, widow of Admiral Cottman. May I inquire why that is?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Page 8, line 3?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Page 8, line 3.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. What is it?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Why is the pension to the widow of Admiral Cottman stricken from the bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I can not say without looking up the report. The committee refused to give a pension in excess of $25 per month for this reason, that when the House passed the war-risk insurance bill last fall it was practically the unanimous sentiment of the House when they gave all the widows in the present war $25 per month that that was the last word from Congress on what the widows ought to have, because they had agreed to give the widows of the privates the same pension as the widows of the officers; that the widows of the officers should receive no more than the widow of a private. And inasmuch as that was the last word from Congress the committee took it we could use that as a guidance, and that if the rate of pension was $25 to all widows it would be a maximum.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Would it be agreeable to the committee to have an amendment so that she should receive a pension of $25?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I could not tell without reading from the report.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. My information is that she is in destitute circumstances and very much in need of a pension. That was the information given to me by Senator JONES, of my State.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Does she not get a pension now under existing law?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I think not; although I am not clear on that point.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I think the gentleman ought to get clear on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I suggest that this bill will very likely be in conference, and the gentleman from Washington in the meantime can get the facts and submit them to the conferees for their consideration.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I will be glad to get the information.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. And I shall be glad to consider it in conference.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill S. 4193.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up the bill S. 4193, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 4193. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Private Calendar.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. It is on the Private Calendar, the same as the other bill.

The SPEAKER. I know; but has the gentleman any request to make?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The bill was read for amendment, as follows:

An act (S. 4193) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FOURTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT DECENNIAL CENSUSES.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) providing for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, and pending that motion I would like to come to some agreement with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS] as to general debate. There was a tentative agreement between the gentleman from Michigan and myself for two hours on a side. I understand the gentleman from Michigan has 14 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN] before adjournment last Saturday was recognized for one hour. I understand that he wants to consume only a very short time, not exceeding 20 minutes, and therefore I ask that general debate conclude in 30 minutes.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. That is satisfactory.

Mr. STAFFORD. How will the time be divided?

Mr. HELM. The gentleman from Michigan to control 14 minutes, and I to control 16 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is that in addition to the time for which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN] has been recognized?

Mr. HELM. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, if he is content to have 16 minutes when he is entitled to an hour——

Mr. HELM. He is not making any objection.

The SPEAKER. What is the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I will have to modify my request and ask that the time for general debate be extended 46 minutes, the gentleman from Michigan to control 14 minutes and myself 30 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STAFFORD. That makes only 44 minutes instead of 46.

Mr. GILLETT. I think it ought to be divided equally. Very likely we will not want to use it, and if we do not we will not use it; but I think it fair that there should be an equal amount on each side.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate close in one hour, the gentleman from Michigan to have 30 minutes and myself 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does that include the hour of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HELM. All time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky, pending his motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour, half to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS]. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman include in that request the statement that it includes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN], who has heretofore been recognized for an hour?

Mr. HELM. It is so understood. The gentleman from Georgia consents to it. It is at his suggestion.

The SPEAKER. And that it includes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. STAFFORD. All the other 434 Members of the House are left out.

Mr. WALSH. They have not been recognized.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill 11984, to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11984, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen oppose the passage of this bill saying no census should be taken during the war and that if one is taken it should be of population, strictly in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution.

They would omit a census of agriculture, of manufactures, of forestry and forest products, and of mines and quarries, but would take a census of population, at a cost of $10,440,000, which, if taken in conjunction with other matter provided for in the bill, would cost only $7,100,000. They would take a census of population, intended primarily, as they say, to form the basis of distribution of representation in Congress, and omit a census of those industries and commodities absolutely necessary in times of war and highly essential in times of peace.

So careful were our forefathers as to the taking of the census that in the second section of the Constitution, adopted just at the close of the Revolutionary War, they provided that a census should be taken within three years from that date and that subsequent censuses should be taken every 10 years thereafter. I take it that all gentlemen are bound by an oath of office, the same as each and every other Member of this House, and that the Director of the Census and those other officials of the Government connected with this matter are also bound by their oath of office, and that this oath of office requires them to support and defend the Constitution.

Now, I would like to know how any man who has in mind the provisions of the Constitution could advocate the policy of not taking a census.

Gentlemen opposing the passage of the bill upon this ground might do well to reflect upon the history and scope of the legislation under which the previous censuses have been taken.

The First Census, provided for and taken shortly after the close of the Revolution, and at a time when our agricultural and manufacturing resources were meager, included only a census of the population. It was evidently not satisfactory to the people, for, strictly speaking, it was the only one of the kind ever taken.

The Second Census, taken in 1800, was an extension of the first, in that it gave information as to age distribution of the free white element of the population, and in that the distribution age was made to apply to females as well as to males. But even this extension did not meet the demands of the most thoughtful and reflective of those times. Previous to the enactment of the law governing that census two of the leading literary societies of America, the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, presided over by Timothy Dwight as its president, and the American Philosophical Society, presided over by Thomas Jefferson as its president, petitioned Congress and suggested that inquiry be made as to the number of births, the number of persons by sex in each of the various specified age groups, the number of native and foreign born citizens and of aliens, the number of persons in each of certain classes of occupations, and the number of married, single, and widowed persons.

The Third Census, taken in 1810, attempted to gather industrial statistics. So did the succeeding one of 1820, and also extended its inquiry to the number of foreign and naturalized persons and to the number of persons engaged in agriculture, commerce, and manufactures.

The census of 1830 omitted inquiry as to industrial statistics, but since that date no census has omitted such important information.

The census of 1840 marks the end of a complete census period of this Nation. The policy of that census and those preceding it was to confine inquiries, as much as possible, to population. They resulted, generally speaking, in an effort to enumerate and to classify the population of the country, with little or no regard for the industrial conditions. It was not so much an effort to ascertain the amount or value of our agricultural or manufactured products as it was to determine the number of our population engaged in such enterprises. Yet in half of those taken even then, notably the census of 1810, of 1820, and of 1840, efforts were made to extend the scope of investigation so as to include statistics of industries.

Since the census of 1840 not one has been taken which has failed to make inquiry concerning our industrial resources, and in this respect our products of agriculture, mine, and manufacture have been given much consideration. The tendency has been to tabulate results of the various fields of activity and to show the quantity and value of such products rather than the various occupations in which our population is engaged.

If gentlemen are really serious in the contention that no census should be taken during the war, why do they not seek to amend the Constitution so as to obviate such an expenditure of both labor and money? Such a course would greatly emphasize their sincerity.

Certainly if our forefathers who framed the Constitution had possessed such forethought and wisdom they would not have felt justified in making such a census provision without providing a war-exception clause.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. As a matter of fact, is anybody opposing the taking of the census in 1920—any Member of this House?

Mr. LARSEN. If you will read the RECORD I think you will find that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] made a statement authorizing such a conclusion.

Mr. COX. Oh, no. I am perfectly willing to have the population census taken. I so stated.

Mr. LARSEN. I did not so understand. At the time the gentleman from Indiana made the remarks I asked him if he would yield to me, in order that I might ask him a question on that point, and he refused.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] propounded the same question to me.

Mr. LARSEN. You did not yield to me when I sought to interrogate you on that line. You may have yielded later to the gentleman from Kentucky for interrogation along this line. I make no complaint, but I will quote your words from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 8160, which are as follows: "I read the hearings before the committee last Sunday instead of going to church, as I should have done. It has been said here that it is constitutionally necessary to take a census. I know of no provision in the Constitution or in any law now upon the books or of any law that Congress could pass that would hold anyone guilty in the event that the next census should not be taken at all."

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. What would be the penalty if Congress did not provide for the taking of the census?

Mr. LARSEN. Then it should be taken under existing law; but I think Members of the House, or anybody connected with the census department as a sworn officer, attempting to prevent it would be guilty of false swearing.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. They asked who opposed the taking of the census. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY], I believe, said the purpose of taking it was to give jobs to Democrats. You recall that, do you not?

Mr. LARSEN. I think that was the substance of his remarks.

Mr. HERSEY. I could not hear the statement of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I understand that the gentleman from Maine said it was to give a lot of Democrats jobs. Did not the gentleman say that?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, but I can not yield further.

The census of 1860 was taken during the Civil War. The enumeration began June 1, 1860, some months after war began, and it was not completed earlier than the latter part of 1862. Among other things it included a census of population, manufactures, agriculture, mortality, and social statistics. No one seems to have even made an attempt to change the rule at that time, and I am of the opinion that the wisdom of the majority will prevent it now.

Prior to the census of 1830 the first Monday in August seems to have been the date for beginning the enumeration, but the law for the census of that year changed it to June 1. The law for the census of 1910 changed it to April 15. Thus it will be seen that the tendency, certainly since 1830, has been toward an earlier date of enumeration.

The present bill provides that it shall be taken as of the 1st day of January.

In the opinion of the committee and of many expert witnesses called before it, this date is better adapted to the requirements of an agricultural census, especially when taken in connection with the enumeration of population, which requires a house-to-house canvass. April 15, the enumeration date fixed by the previous census bill, is not a good date for the taking of a census of crops, on account of the lapse of time following the harvesting of the previous one; nor is it a reliable date for the taking of a census of live stock. January 1 is undoubtedly the season of the year when our population is most accessible. If climatic or other conditions prevent operations at that time, the director is clothed with discretionary power to postpone the work until such time as it can be performed.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] raves over the fact that we propose to take a census at such a season of the year, and take persons out of agricultural and other industrial pursuits to assist in making the enumeration. It will not take more than 30 days to make it; and I may say to the gentleman that if we take it on the 1st day of January it will undoubtedly be at the season of the year best adapted to taking a census of any kind. Generally speaking, parties engaged in agricultural industries will be used in the taking of the census, and they can be better spared from the farms at that season of the year than any other.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] waxed eloquent over a provision of the bill fixing the salary of the Director of the Census at $7,500 per annum and that of the Assistant Director at $4,500. May I say to him that the salary of the director in 1900, 20 years ago, was $7,500, exactly the amount fixed in the present bill? May I also remind him that we now have no Assistant Director of the Census, and it is not contemplated that we will until the beginning of the Fourteenth decennial census period. The salary provided for such an officer when appointed will be $500 less per annum than was allowed during the taking of the last census.

The salary and compensation fixed in the bill for other officers and employees in connection with the taking of the next census is the result of thoughtful consideration upon the part of the committee, whose only desire was to do justice by all concerned. In the discharge of this duty error may have been committed, but if so I trust it is not of a very serious nature.

The census of 1910 cost $15,270,000. The one of 1920 will cover more territory, will embrace more resources, will give more information, and will contain at least 10,000,000 more in population. When it is considered that it is to be taken under war conditions, and at the estimated cost of $17,987,000, I do not feel that gentlemen of the House can with good grace say the committee was extravagant in fixing compensation to be allowed those taking it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], in the course of debate, gave utterance to words the import of which I am sure, was not well considered by him; otherwise he would not have given expression to them. Considering the character of the remarks and the eminent source from which they emanated I do not feel that they should pass unnoticed.

As I am the only member of the Census Committee coming from the locality where the remarks are perhaps calculated to do most harm, and the only member of the Georgia delegation whose present plans contemplate a discussion of the bill, it is deemed proper that I should make some reply.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, in a discussion of that portion of the bill providing for the appointment of supervisors, and incidentally a change of the date of enumeration from April 15 to January 1, used the following language:

> But why was January 1 selected? I suppose that it was selected just for the very purpose of giving a basis of an excuse for not having the President appoint the supervisors. Now, the Director of the Census is a politician. This administration has not appointed to that office statisticians but politicians. The Director of the Census who was first appointed by the administration was Mr. Harris, from Georgia, who, if I recollect aright, was the chairman of the Democratic committee of that State; and I knew he gave up much of his time, which ought to have been spent in the Census Bureau, to the pursuit of politics in his own State. I am told that the present Director of the Census was the campaign manager of Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina.

These remarks, as I construe them, involve not only a criticism of Mr. Harris, now a private citizen of Georgia, but also of the present Director of the Census and of the President of the United States.

Regardless of what views may be entertained by the gentleman from Massachusetts regarding Mr. Harris, of Georgia, I do not think it is fair to leave it as his impression that because the present Director of the Census was once, perchance, the campaign manager of Senator SIMMONS he would so far degrade himself and pollute the honorable position which he now holds as to appoint inefficient and unworthy supervisors on that account. [Applause.] If the gentleman draws his conclusions in this respect from experiences which he may have had with managers of his own campaigns, I would say he has indeed been very unfortunate. My impression of Mr. Rogers, the present Director of the Census, is that he is a gentleman of highest character, who can be trusted to do what he thinks is right and proper under any and all circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. I do.

Mr. HELM. If the Director of the Census was appointed by the President, as he was, and the Secretary of Commerce was appointed by the President, as he was, and if he is subject to the strictures and criticisms that the gentlemen on the Republican side of the Chamber have imputed to him, is it not quite possible that the supervisors, if they were appointed by the President, would be equally as obnoxious to the gentlemen on the opposite side of the Chamber as the Director of the Census and the Secretary of Commerce, both of whom were appointed by the President himself?

Mr. LARSEN. I should say that would undoubtedly be true. As for Mr. Harris, I have known him intimately and personally for nearly 20 years. No one would dare say he is not a gentleman. Even the gentleman from Massachusetts, I suppose, concedes that. May I suggest to him that the good people of Georgia, who perhaps know more of Mr. Harris than he does, regard him as a business man rather than as a politician? But be that as it may, they would certainly be slow to believe that as Director of the Census he neglected important public business in order to pursue political matters in his own State. [Applause.] I may also say to the gentleman, in this connection, that the chairmanship of the State Democratic committee of Georgia has not in recent years imposed such onerous burdens on its chairman as cause him to neglect, certainly to any great extent, either public or private matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LARSEN. I would like about one minute more.

Mr. HELM. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. LARSEN. In order that the gentleman from Massachusetts might enlighten us as to just when and what business matters had been neglected by Mr. Harris in the pursuit of politics in Georgia, I requested that he yield to me for a question at the time he gave utterance to his remarks, but he declined to yield, and hence I was unable to ask for information at the time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. I can not, in the limited time I have.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I should like to ask the gentleman a question in that connection.

Mr. LARSEN. I have not time. If I had it I would yield.

Perhaps, inasmuch as I have suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts the desirability of his specifying what public business was neglected by Mr. Harris, as Director of the Census, in order to look after political matters in Georgia, he will yet enlighten us along these lines. If he does not, we shall conclude that his charge was not well founded.

It is a matter of general knowledge that Mr. Harris administered the affairs of the Census Department so satisfactorily that President Wilson appointed him to a position on the Federal Trade Commission, of which he soon became chairman. [Applause.]

Now, if the criticism of Mr. Harris and the present Director of the Census is justified, in accordance with the words of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, the responsibility for this criticism must necessarily rest upon our President. As for one, I do not feel that it is justified.

Certainly the President needs no defense or eulogy from one so unworthy as I, but I may be pardoned if I state my opinion of him, and in doing so say that it is my belief that when the impartial historian of the future writes the history of the nations he will record Washington as the father of our country, the author of our liberty, and as the one man who made possible the adoption of our Federal Constitution, that great beacon light of the world to which the succeeding generations of mankind have looked for liberty and freedom; that he will also record Jefferson as our great political philosopher and intellectual genius; Lincoln as our greatest apostle of freedom and the preserver of our Union; Lee as our greatest military genius; and Woodrow Wilson as our greatest dynamic force, combining more of the great and good qualities of those whom I have mentioned than any other one man. [Applause.]

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desired to ask a question of the gentleman who has just spoken in regard to the political activities of the former Director of the Census, Mr. Harris, but the gentleman declined to yield. It seems, from what I heard the gentleman say, that it has been suggested during this debate that Mr. Harris may have neglected his duties as Director of the Census to take part in politics in the State of Georgia. I do not know anything about that, but a further charge has been made that Mr. Harris, while a member of the Federal Trade Commission, tendered his resignation, to take effect at a date far in advance, and then left his duties as a member of the Federal Trade Commission to go to Georgia to participate in politics.

Mr. LARSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I can not yield in the limited time I have.

Mr. LARSEN. That charge has not been made here in the consideration of this bill before the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will ask the gentleman not to interrupt me. The charge has been made that Mr. Harris, with his resignation on file, to take effect at some future date, went into the senatorial contest in Georgia, and I am informed that the main question in dispute, or one of them, anyway, is how much part Mr. Harris had, in his capacity as a member of the Federal Trade Commission, in authorizing the payment of a fee of $30,000 to a prominent attorney, the question being as to whether there was any right to pay such a fee. That is politics in the State of Georgia, and the former Director of the Census seems to be in it; but according to the gentleman who has just spoken, Mr. Harris is regarded down there as a citizen rather than as a politician.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HELM. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LARSEN. May I say to the gentleman from Washington that it is a very easy matter to make charges that can not be substantiated. May I ask why it is that you have not submitted to the House some proof in substantiation of the charges that you now make, or say have been made by others? You repeat charges without saying who made them or vouching the truth of them. The gentleman must know or believe the charges are not well founded, otherwise as a citizen of the United States and as a Member of Congress he should have instituted an investigation and had the matter looked into long before the resignation of Mr. Harris. [Applause.]

I may say to the gentleman that I have known Mr. Harris for 20 years, and, while I am in no way concerned or interested in his campaign, I am sure that Mr. Harris stands as high in the State of Georgia and among the good people who know him as does the gentleman who criticizes him. In addition to this I may say that it is my belief that Mr. Harris has at all times discharged the duties of a public nature intrusted to him to the entire satisfaction of his constituents, and in many instances to much better advantage than has the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia seems not quite to have understood the statement that I made. It is not my purpose to make any charges against Mr. Harris in his capacity as a private citizen, but I undertook to state that in the senatorial contest for the Democratic nomination now raging in Georgia a large part of the row prevailing there seems to rage around the charges made by some of the candidates against the other candidate—a Democratic row pure and simple, the whole thing, apparently.

Mr. LARSEN. It is, as you make it, a Republican row. Nobody is growling about it except you.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no. There are columns about it in the Georgia newspapers, as to whether Mr. Harris had any part, in his capacity as a member of the Federal Trade Commission—although his resignation was filed to take effect at some future date—as to whether he had any part in authorizing the payment of a fee of $30,000 to an attorney for that Federal Trade Commission. Now, I do not belong to the party in power. I am not in the councils of the party. It is up to those who are in the councils of that party to watch these commissions, to ascertain if fees are being paid in excess, and it is their own affair if their member of the Federal Trade Commission seeks to get out from his office, while still drawing pay, and go into a campaign.

I yield back any time remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one-half minute.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, to-day our soldiers battle against a foreign enemy, and we rightly praise them for the great sacrifice they make for our common country. They are fighting for the principle of government by consent of the people.

It must not be forgotten, however, that the people here at home have also a high duty to perform if government by the consent of the people is to be secured. The consent of the people is given by their vote at the polls. If they fail to vote, or do not vote according to their own best judgment, they neglect their highest privilege and also one of their most sacred duties. If they permit those who seek special advantage for themselves to dictate how they shall vote, it is little, if any, better than allowing the few to govern as they please without a vote of the people. There has been a tendency toward this very evil. Those who seek for themselves some special privilege now try to accomplish their purpose by the control of certain newspapers and magazines for the purpose of molding public opinion, or they work through the "bosses." Generally they use both methods.

Because their motives would generally be apparent, they do not openly urge or oppose measures or policies affecting their special interests, but they raise a great cry about some unimportant question or resort to the use of abuse.

At the present time, while pretending a desire to avoid a division of public opinion, they are busily engaged in different parts of the country in trying to revive disputes which have been long settled, and also in making false issues.

The primary election system has done much in many communities to prevent the growth of bossism in politics. This system, adopted by most States in recent years, enables the voters of any party to vote at the polls according to their own best judgment, and for the men whom they prefer.

Under the old convention system, the political boss was to be found in every city. He controlled the delegates to the convention, and they usually voted as he ordered. The political bosses are trying in almost every State to-day to have the direct primary election laws repealed, in order to make their control of the political party complete. In the meantime, they try to dictate to every precinct committeeman and ward leader in the city, and tell him not only how he must vote, but try to compel him to have the party voters in his precinct vote the same way.

If they should succeed in their efforts, it is perfectly clear that the people will have very little opportunity for real choice as to public officials, because the candidates of the different parties will be named by the bosses, or as they like to call themselves, leaders, and the people would have the poor privilege of choosing between their selections. The candidate then owing his nomination to one or two political bosses must, in order to keep their favor, do what he is told by them. It is easy to see that the bosses will carry their demands as far as they can safely do so.

The only remedy for conditions such as these is the faithful performance by every citizen of his duty to vote. Every man should express his best and independent judgment by his vote on the primary election day.

A number of States hold primary elections during the months of July and August. On Tuesday, the 13th day of August, primary elections are held in two States, Alabama and Ohio. In the State of Alabama the people have practically gotten rid of bosses, and in Ohio, the State in which I live, I feel that it will only be a short time until there will be no such thing as political bosses.

In the State of Ohio the bosses still try to compel every precinct committeeman to vote as they order and to insist upon the other voters in the precinct doing likewise. In the city of Cleveland, however, where the people have the habit of thinking for themselves, many precinct committeemen resent the insult to their intelligence and independence and insist upon using their own judgment, as every man should do.

Let us hope that before long in every city and State in the Union the primary election will be decided by the free and independent vote of the people themselves. When the people realize the importance of voting at the primary elections and vote without fear or favor of any man, then will machine politics be abolished and the humblest citizen in the land will have equal opportunity with the wealthy and powerful, and government by consent of the people will be secure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a census of the population, agriculture, manufactures, and mines and quarries of the United States shall be taken by the Director of the Census in the year 1920 and every 10 years thereafter. The census herein provided for shall include each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. A census of Guam and Samoa shall be taken in the same year by the Navy Department and a census of the Panama Canal Zone by the War Department in accordance with plans prescribed or approved by the Director of the Census.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "Navy Department" and insert in lieu thereof "respective governors of said islands."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the words "War Department" and insert in lieu thereof "Governor of the Canal Zone."

Mr. HELM. The purpose of these amendments is to simplify the work. Instead of the census being taken by the War Department it is to be taken by persons in control of the respective islands and the Canal Zone. The gentleman will observe that this is to be done in accordance with plans approved by the Director of the Census. I do not think that it was the purpose of the committee drafting the bill, or the intention of this committee, that anyone shall be sent to either the island of Guam or Samoa or to the Canal Zone for the purpose of taking this census, but that the schedules and outline of the work shall be forwarded to the governors of these respective political organizations and be conducted by the governors of the islands of Guam and Samoa and the Canal Zone, thereby saving the expense of sending men to these places so far distant from the Capital.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the amendment the Governor of the Canal Zone would have authority delegated to him to incur any expense that might be occasioned by the taking of the census in the Canal Zone.

Mr. HELM. The Appropriation Committee will provide for that when the proper time comes for making provision for taking it in these places.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman to say that it was not the intention to have any census representative take the census.

Mr. HELM. It was the intention not to have any representative go to these places, but it is to be done in an economical way by competent men on the islands and in the Canal Zone.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I had 10 minutes under general debate and did not use it. I wish to say that I have had a number of inquiries made of me to furnish the Great Britain or people act of 1918; also the Dominion elections act, section 33a, inserted by the war-time elections act and the Canadian act known as "An act to confer the electoral franchise upon women"; also the translation of a bill introduced in the French Parliament in 1918. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the several acts.

The acts referred to are entitled "Representation of the people act, 1918" (8 Geo. 5, c. 64, sec. 4); the "Dominion elections act," section 33a, inserted by war-time elections act, section 1 (d) (7–8 Geo. 5, c. 39, assented to Sept. 20, 1917); the Canadian act entitled "An act to confer the electoral franchise upon women," passed by the House of Commons April 12, 1918, amended and passed by the Senate May 3, 1918; and, lastly, the bill concerning woman suffrage introduced into the Chamber of Deputies January 24, 1918, by M. Emile Magniez, deputy.

These several laws relating to woman suffrage and the bill introduced into the French Chamber of Deputies are as follows:

GREAT BRITAIN.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT, 1918.

(8 Geo. 5, c. 64, sec. 4.)

4.—(1) A woman shall be entitled to be registered as a parliamentary elector for a constituency (other than a university constituency) if she—

(a) Has attained the age of 30 years; and

(b) Is not subject to any legal incapacity; and

(c) Is entitled to be registered as a local-government elector in respect of the occupation in that constituency of land or premises (not being a dwelling house) of a yearly value of not less than £5 or of a dwelling house, or is the wife of a husband entitled to be so registered.

(2) A woman shall be entitled to be registered as a parliamentary elector for a university constituency if she has attained the age of 30 years and either would be entitled to be so registered if she were a man or has been admitted to and passed the final examination and kept under the conditions required of women by the university the period of residence necessary for a man to obtain a degree at any university forming, or forming a part of, a university constituency which did not at the time the examination was passed admit women to degrees.

(3) A woman shall be entitled to be registered as a local-government elector for any local-government electoral area—

(a) Where she would be entitled to be so registered if she were a man; and

(b) Where she is the wife of a man who is entitled to be so registered in respect of premises in which they both reside, and she has attained the age of 30 years and is not subject to any legal incapacity.

For the purpose of this provision, a naval or military voter who is registered in respect of a residence qualification which he would have had but for his service shall be deemed to be resident in accordance with the qualification.

CANADA.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT, §33A.

(Inserted by war-time elections act, §1(d), 7-8 Geo. 5, c. 39, assented to Sept. 20, 1917.)

33A. (1) Every female person shall be capable of voting and qualified to vote at a Dominion election in any Province or in the Yukon Territory, who, being a British subject and qualified as to age, race, and residence, as required in the case of a male person in such Province or in the Yukon Territory, as the case may be, is the wife, widow, mother, sister, or daughter of any person, male or female, living or dead, who is serving or has served without Canada in any of the military forces, or within or without Canada in any of the naval forces, of Canada or of Great Britain in the present war: Provided, That this section shall not apply to the wife, widow, mother, sister, or daughter of a person no longer serving as aforesaid, unless such person has died in or has been honorably discharged from such service, or, in the case of an officer, has died in or has been permitted to resign from such service or has been dispensed by competent authority from further service, or in any case has died after honorable discharge, resignation by permission, or dispensation from further service as aforesaid.

(2) Such naval forces of Canada shall be deemed not to include members thereof engaged within Canada who may become members after the passing of this act.

AN ACT TO CONFER THE ELECTORAL FRANCHISE UPON WOMEN.

(Passed by the House of Commons Apr. 12, 1918. Amended and passed by the Senate May 3, 1918.)

His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. (1) Every female person shall be entitled to vote at a Dominion election who—

(a) Is a British subject;

(b) Is of the full age of 21 years and upward;

(c) Has resided in the constituency in which she seeks to vote for a period of at least three months immediately preceding the date of the issue of the writ for an election in such constituency; and

(d) Is not disqualified on account of race, blood, or original nationality to vote at elections for members of the legislative assembly of the Province in which the constituency is situate in which such female person seeks to vote.

2. For the purposes of this act a female person shall be deemed to be a British subject—

(a) If she was born a British subject and is unmarried or is married to a British subject and has not become a subject of any foreign power; or

(b) If she has herself been personally naturalized as a British subject and has not since become the subject of a foreign power; or

(c) If, being a married woman and previously an alien, she has become a British subject by marriage or by the naturalization as a British subject of her father while she was a minor, and in either case has done nothing (other than in the second case by marriage) to forfeit or lose her status as a British subject and obtains and presents to the official or officials in charge of the preparation or revision of the voters' lists of the constituency a certificate under the signature of a judge or any court of record or of any superior court, under the seal of the said court, certifying that such female person is of the full age of 21 years, has resided in Canada a sufficient length of time, and is possessed of all requirements necessary to entitle her, if unmarried, to become naturalized as a British subject and that she has taken the oath of allegiance to His Majesty; or

(d) If, notwithstanding she is married to an alien, she was at the time of such marriage a British subject by birth and has not herself sworn allegiance to any foreign power: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to the wife of an alien enemy.

2. This act shall be construed as one with the Dominion elections act, chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and the war-time elections act, chapter 39 of the statutes of 1917.

3. Notwithstanding anything in this act contained, it shall not be necessary by reason of any of the provisions thereof, to prepare new voters' lists for the purpose of any by-election to be held before the first day of January, 1919, and in the case of any such by-election any lawful lists available therefor may be used for the purposes of such by-election to the same extent and with the same validity as if this act had not been passed.

FRANCE.

TRANSLATION OF A BILL CONCERNING WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

[Introduced in the Chamber of Deputies Jan. 24, 1918, by M. Emile Magniez, deputy. Journal officiel, Doc. parl.—Chambre, annexe no. 4228 (Apr. 21, 1918).]

SECTION 1. The right to vote for municipal, cantonal, legislative, and senatorial elections is hereby granted to women.

SEC. 2. The age restrictions and other conditions of the possession and exercise of this right shall be the same as those applied to men, except as provided in section 3.

SEC. 3. Women who are keepers of houses of prostitution and of assignation and women enrolled on the list of prostitutes shall be excluded from the right to vote.

SEC. 4. At senatorial elections the municipal council of each commune shall appoint to the electoral college, in addition to the number of male delegates to which it is at present entitled, an equal number of delegates selected from among the women voters of the commune.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the several acts referred to? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "population," strike out the words "agriculture, manufactures, and mines and quarries."

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, when the immortal Daniel Webster was nearing the close of an eventful life and while attending a banquet in his honor it was noted that he was in a very serious mood, and when he was questioned he said, "The most serious thought of my life is the feeling of my own responsibility."

When the President of the United States, on April 2, 1917, nearing the close of his great war message to the Congress paused, and, thinking, no doubt, of his position as Commander in Chief, solemnly exclaimed, "It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war." He, too, felt his awful responsibility.

During this war Congress every one of us must have felt at times the great individual responsibility laid upon us in the part we play in the conduct of a world-wide war. To-day in another room of this Capitol sits the great Committee on Ways and Means to provide for the largest revenue bill ever enacted by any nation. The responsibility of the Democratic leader [Mr. KITCHIN] is tremendous, but the responsibility of the President or of a great leader is not so great and important as that of the humblest Representative who honestly attempts at this time to be "a watch dog of the Treasury."

I was much interested in the honest, straightforward remarks the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] made upon this bill. I have noticed during my short service in this House that the gentleman from Indiana has always been in favor of economy and has always stood for the cutting down of useless expenses of the Government as well as against the making of reckless expenditures and the passage of "pork-barrel" bills; and I agree with him in his unanswerable argument that there is no reason at the present time why this Congress should spend additional millions in the taking of a useless census, and that a census of the population only is all that is necessary to be taken in 1920, and that a census of everything else would be not economy but extravagance.

Now, I have offered an amendment to this first section striking out from this census bill everything but an enumeration of the population.

There is much of misconception and misinformation in regard to the necessity of taking a census of all matters outside of population in 1920. All that the Constitution requires is an enumeration of the population every 10 years, and the Constitution nowhere provides any method for taking even a census of population.

If the Constitution had not provided for a census of population every 10 years no committee of this Congress would have had the hardihood to present the present bill in this time of war or ask for a census of everything in sight. The present Census Bureau might take a census of population by mail by returns from town officers and mayors of cities, who all have up-to-date statistics of their own population, and such a census as that would meet the Constitution without any extra expense in this time of war.

Even if we should find it necessary and proper to take a census of the population by the same methods and expenses as was provided by the one taken 10 years ago, we ought at the present time to go no further than population. We can not go further without committing a great wrong against the people of the Nation when we are so earnestly called upon for economy and to "save to win."

The present bill provides, in addition to a census of the population, that there shall be taken a census of manufactures in 1920, and there are some in favor of this bill who loudly proclaim that it is absolutely necessary that we have a full census of manufactures every 10 years as well as a census of the population. To take a full census of manufactures under the present bill would result in the publication in 1923 of many large volumes of statistics showing the state of our disorganized manufactures three years before that publication, to wit, in 1920. Such a census could be of no value to this Nation. The millions we would spend for such a census is very much needed at the present time, especially when this work has been supplanted by a census of manufactures recently taken by the Census Bureau.

I read from the Annual Report of the Director of the Census for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917. On page 16 of that report the Director of the Census says, under the subject "Census of manufactures":

The last quinquennial census of manufactures, which covered the calendar year 1914, was taken during the following year. * * * The work of compiling and publishing these press summaries, or preliminary statements, began in June, 1915, and was completed in August, 1916. The summaries gave * * * statistics as to number of establishments; proprietors, officials, and employees; horsepower; capital; salaries and wages; cost of materials; value of products; and other items. * * * Tables were prepared and published in pamphlet form covering four census years and giving comparative statistics of manufactures for the United States by geographic divisions, States, and industries.

* * * The preliminary figures having thus been published, the clerical force of the bureau was concentrated, so far as possible, upon the preparation of the analytical tables and text for the final reports. These are being published first in bulletin form, a separate quarto bulletin being issued for each State and the District of Columbia and for 41 selected industries. These bulletins will later be bound together in three large quarto volumes. Of the 49 bulletins for the States and the District of Columbia, 33 have been published and the remaining 16 are in the hands of the printer; and of the 41 industry bulletins, 13 have been published, 24 are in proof, and copy for 3 more is now in the hands of the printer. In the case of the remaining industry, shipbuilding, the 1914 statistics will not be published separately, but will be issued together with those for 1916, which are now being compiled in connection with the census of transportation by water. * * * The work of preparing the State bulletins for publication in the form of two bound volumes is now in progress and analytical tables are being compiled for the report on industries, to be published in a similar volume.

The abstract of the census of manufactures was completed and published during the fiscal year. This is an octavo volume of 722 pages presenting in condensed and convenient form the more important statistics derived from the census of 1914. It contains 223 tables, with descriptive text giving brief comments on the statistics. This abstract is in some respects a new departure in census work and has proved to be a popular publication. It differs from the abstracts of the decennial censuses of 1890 and 1900 in that it contains analytical tables, comparative figures for earlier years, and text discussions; it differs from the abstract of the decennial census of 1910 in that it presents the statistics in considerably greater detail, and at the same time is of octavo instead of quarto size, and therefore more convenient for handling; and it differs from all former abstracts in that it contains statistics of manufactures only. Since the abstract will supply the needs of a great majority of those using the statistics of manufactures, it was the first volume of the final reports to be issued. There has already been a great demand from manufacturers and others for this publication.

The bureau has recently had a full census of all the factories, plants, and manufactories that in any way have been able and prepared to build ships, aeroplanes, guns, munitions of war, or war materials. Those having charge of the conduct of the war are not relying upon past censuses, and they will therefore not receive any help from the census of manufactures and population made in 1920 and printed in 1923. The Congress can order a census of manufactures any time when it is needed. We do not have to wait for a 10-year period, and such a census will be made whenever it is needed, but to be of use it must be made with promptness and dispatch when our industries have again returned to normal conditions, and also, to be of value, it must be made in a time of peace.

As to a census of agriculture as provided by this bill to be made in 1920, how useless it will be for us to expend millions to obtain a dozen volumes of statistics in 1923, when the Department of Agriculture is engaged to-day in making a continual census of agriculture. Its reports are of great value to the Nation, because they are made monthly and are to-day relied upon, and not those made by the census of 10 years ago, and these reports from the Department of Agriculture will be relied upon for information in the days to come, and not any census made in 1920 and printed in 1923.

Before the Committee on the Census appeared the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston, who testified, among other things, as follows:

Secretary HOUSTON. We have over 150,000 volunteer reporters working for us. We have in each State reporting for us a very considerable number of the best farmers, the most alert farmers in each county; they are on the job throughout the year. Many of them have been working for the department for years, trained in the department's methods. The reports are made by the best farmers we have been able to select in every community in the Union. We get our information in that way.

We have recently appropriated to the Department of Agriculture millions of dollars to make a census of agriculture, and that department is now making monthly reports of agricultural products all over the Nation of all crops planted, of the kind of crops raised and produced, the kind of products of the animal industry of the country, and the plant industry and plant diseases, marketing, the distribution of farm crops, the purchasing of farm seeds, and so forth.

In addition to this, the Food Administration bureau, at great expense, is making a census all the time of food products and all that pertains to the farm and the food production of the country. Now, why should we, at great expense, expend other millions in duplicating the work now going on by the Agricultural Department and Food Administration and other bureaus and get no better and perhaps not so good results?

The same is true of a census of mines and mining provided by this bill. A few days ago this Congress provided, at great expense, a census and survey of all the mines and mineral resources of the country in connection with the Geological Survey; and why should we spend another million dollars in a duplication of that work and make another survey that will not be of value to us until 1923?

The same is also true of a survey of forests and forest products provided for by an amendment to this bill. By recent legislation, at great expense, we have provided for a number of special censuses and surveys of all the forests and forest products of the country. Now, why at this time, when we are at war, should we be called upon to make another census of forest products, when we should practice the strictest economy and not spend another million in duplicating the work of these surveys by a census that will not be available until 1923?

During the present war Congress will pay no attention to this bill if enacted. Those who have the conduct of the war will obtain no help or benefit from this bill, and in the days of peace to come Congress will not rely upon any census made in 1920; but after our manufactures and industries and agricultural and mining pursuits have all returned to a normal condition it will be time enough then to take a census of these manufactures and industries, which can then be made promptly and as an emergency, and down to date, and will not be made simply to give place and power to an army of slackers who want salaries and offices and profits from the Government of the United States.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. COX. How much will it cost to take the census of the population?

Mr. HERSEY. That depends upon how it is taken. If it is taken as the census of 1913 was taken, it would be very reasonable.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman any approximate figure as to what is a reasonable amount?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Ten million dollars.

Mr. HERSEY. It ought not to take that.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman consider the census taken in 1900 a reasonable amount?

Mr. HERSEY. Oh, I never examined it.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman consider the cost of the census taken in 1900 a reasonable amount?

Mr. HERSEY. There were a great many frauds in the census of 1910, in the padding of the population at least.

Mr. HELM. Was the system good or bad in either instance?

Mr. HERSEY. It could be improved upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERSEY. I know that while we are appropriating billions of dollars it seems a very small matter to attempt to save a few millions. I do not know how long the present war will continue, how many more billions will be demanded, how many more bonds will be issued, how many more liberty loans will be needed, how many more war-savings stamps must be sold, but I do know that there will come a time, and it will come soon, when the people will demand a stern accounting from those who agree to lavish and useless expenditure, under "pork-barrel" appropriations, of millions by increasing the expenses and salaries and by organizing and maintaining here in Washington a great army of political slackers who are but parasites upon the body of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I still am not able to diagnose the case of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY]. His attitude with reference to this bill is incomprehensible to me. The question whether or not the census shall be extended to manufactures, mines, and mining came up in the minds of members of the committee and we sought an answer to that question from the very best available sources. Hence we called before the committee the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce, representatives of the Bureau of Mines, and the Director of the Geological Survey.

We also directed inquiries to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and other commercial bodies and manufacturing organizations, and all our information is to the effect that a census of manufactures, mines, and quarries is of the utmost importance. Many of them emphasize the fact that it will be of more importance following this war than at any other period in our history to take an inventory of our national assets. It is incomprehensible to me that any intelligent man with broad vision, recognizing this Government in its several activities as the greatest business concern in the world, thinks that it should not take an inventory of its assets. The gentleman asserts that this is an undertaking to make places for a lot of political slackers. I would inquire upon what basis he makes any such assertion as that? Every census that has been taken since I have been a voter was taken under a Republican administration and on terms substantially the same as in this law. Yet I never thought that in framing of census bills the responsible party in power had no higher conception of its duty to the people than to provide places for a lot of political adherents of a party in power. I would have contempt for the Republican Party if I thought that it could be prompted by any such mean, low motives. I do not assume that if this census is taken, beginning the 1st of July, 1919, and extending over to 1922, that it will afford a refuge for political slackers or men or women who may seek to avoid any of their obligations growing out of this war. On the contrary, I assume that this census will be taken in a way that will interfere as little as possible with the activities of the war that is going on, and if the war is over no such condition as the gentleman mentions would intervene.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. What was done under the appropriation made at the last session of Congress for a food survey with regard to taking an agricultural census during the past year, if anything?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The agricultural appropriation bill and the bill providing for a survey were for the fiscal year and necessarily must be quickly taken. It is taken through agents in the field on estimates and is not accurate but is for immediate use and in no way interferes with or overlaps or duplicates the work of the Census Bureau provided for in this bill.

Mr. GOOD. My recollection is that the amount appropriated for that survey was quite a considerable sum, running into a couple of million dollars or more.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. GOOD. It seems to me that that same organization ought to be qualified to do this work, so that there may be no duplication.

Mr. ALEXANDER. As I say, this is a census of agriculture. It will be the only accurate census we will get of mines and mining, because we will go to the original sources of information. The information is now taken quickly through agents and based on estimates, but all statisticians and political economists recognize the census as the only source of accurate information.

Mr. GOOD. I recall that when we had under discussion the repeal of the law, for which I think Mr. Burleson was responsible, to take an agricultural census every five years, there were some hearings, and it was admitted that an accurate agricultural census should not be taken. No farmer knows exactly how many bushels of corn he raises or how many bushels of wheat or rye or barley or how many tons of hay. The whole thing in that hearing, as I recollect it, was based on the best estimates the individual could make. So it is, after all, not accurate. It is a guess.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It may be in a sense inaccurate, but I am sure that an agent at a county seat can not sit down in his office and estimate how much wheat and corn and rye and other farm products have been raised in the county as well as the individual farmer can tell.

Mr. GOOD. Was that the way the food survey was made?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It was made through agents in different counties, who made a general survey.

Mr. GOOD. I thought they visited the individual farmer.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no.

Mr. GOOD. Then they had too much money.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY], and I support it because if we are to pass a census bill at this time the work should be confined, in my opinion, exclusively to a census of the population. As a matter of fact, this bill should not be considered at this time. Legislation of this character should not be passed at this time.

It is impossible for us to tell nearly two years in advance of the census period what it may be wise to do when the time comes to take the census. If we are still engaged in war, it seems quite likely that it will be wise to confine the census activities to an enumeration of the population. On the other hand, it may develop that it is wise to have special examinations made at that time in order to secure and preserve a permanent record of the abnormal conditions existing in the industries at that time. It may be that it will be wise to go even further into some of these activities than is now proposed. On the other hand, it may not be wise to go into them at all. On the other hand, if in the meantime peace shall come and normal conditions are in the course of being established, it will probably be wise to conduct inquiries and investigations along lines with regard to which we are not now fully advised. It seems to me that a survey of the present situation and a consideration of present conditions all lead inevitably to the conclusion that it is utterly futile and foolish to legislate at this time in regard to matters on which we can not have full information nearly two years in advance of the advent. Some gentlemen have suggested that we should make a census provision at this time ample and wide, as is proposed, because conditions will be abnormal, and that we should have a record of that situation. Assuming that to be a sound argument, we can not at this time tell how far we shall want to go, in what direction we should extend our inquiries, just what class of inquiries we should make, so far in advance of the time and with so little knowledge as we now have as to the conditions that will exist. We never have, so far as I am informed, provided for a census so far in advance. But in times of profound peace, when matters are moving along in a normal and ordinary way, we may be able to tell, we might be able to determine even two years in advance, what it would be wise to include in the investigations and inquiries of a census. But under these circumstances no man is wise enough to forecast the future, no man is wise enough to know what should be embraced within the census inquiry, and therefore the Congress is simply wasting its time in legislating on the subject. I predict that whatever may be the form of this legislation as it passes this House it will be radically different when it becomes a law, and that if it becomes a law in the near future it will be radically amended before we reach the census period.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all concerned about the law being passed at this early time—to me that is a very minor consideration—nor am I very much concerned about the fear of some of my Republican friends over there that there is going to be a lot of jobs given out to somebody. That does not give me any trouble or worry whatever. Not that I care anything about the jobs, but you who are preaching that doctrine to-day do not believe what you are preaching, not one of you. I was a Member of this body 10 years ago, when the census was taken. A very warm Republican friend of mine was made district supervisor in my district. I thought we had an understanding, he and I, as to the division of these little enumerators. It finally wound up by the Democratic Party getting two enumerators in one township where there was not a Republican who could qualify for it. So that is the extent of Democratic patronage the third district of Indiana got when the census of 1910 was taken. This patronage does not concern me at all. You men are just as big political grabbers for jobs as any Democrat on the floor of the House.

Mr. GARNER. And probably a little bit more so.

Mr. COX. And probably a little bit more so. So I hope no man will rise any more on the floor of the House and discuss this from that viewpoint. But I am sincere in supporting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine. I concede that it is necessary to have a constitutional census of population, but I am unprepared to concede the necessity of taking such a voluminous census at this time. If I could see where it would increase the production one extra bushel of wheat, rye, oats, corn, barley, hay, I would quickly vote for it. If I could see where it would produce an extra pound of pork or beef or mutton or any other food product, I would willingly and gladly vote for it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield at that point for a question?

Mr. COX. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Do I understand the gentleman's position that he never was in favor of taking a census?

Mr. COX. Oh, no.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If it will not produce another pound of pork or another bushel of wheat——

Mr. COX. I admit in peace times it is necessary to take this census, but what the nations of the earth need to-day in this war is food. They want bread and meat; they want something to support and maintain their armies and civilian population at home, and instead of taking these people out of the line of production in producing these things they want to leave them at home. Now, in section 8 of this bill, I would like to have some gentleman at this time explain just how the taking of an agricultural census will increase production—to find out the occupants of the farm, tenure, acreage of farm, acreage of woodland, value of farm and improvements and the incumbrance thereon, value of farm implements, number of live stock on farms, ranges, and elsewhere, and the quantities of crops and other farm products for the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration? I repeat, how is that going to stimulate production if production is what we are after in the country, and we certainly are after it, because the burden of feeding not only our people but half the population of Europe is resting upon the shoulders of the farmers of the United States to-day, to-morrow, and until this war closes. Now, there is another thing I want briefly to mention. It is conceded, I think, by everybody who has touched this bill or knows anything about it that it would be a matter of economy to take a constitutional census of the population.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. Here is the condition in the city of Washington: We recently passed an appropriation of $10,000,000 to provide homes and to build dormitories for the clerical force that is here and 20,000 more soon to arrive. When these figures are being compiled that will be taken by the enumerators out in the various parts of the country it will increase the clerical force here in Washington anywhere from 15,000 to 20,000 clerks. They have got to come here, and soon thereafter Congress will be called upon to make another appropriation, in all probability, of $10,000,000 more, with which to provide homes and build dormitories for clerks, and so forth, coming here for that purpose.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. HELM. Do I understand you to say it will be necessary to house 20,000 more clerks?

Mr. COX. Fifteen thousand to twenty thousand.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. COX. How many clerks came here 10 years ago?

Mr. HELM. About 3,000.

Mr. COX. Now, then, we could take a constitutional census and comply with the organic law of the Nation in every respect, saving to this Government a few millions of dollars, a thing that is certainly very essential now in view of the condition of the Treasury, and, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] well said a while ago, when the Ways and Means Committee is racking its brains in connection with the Treasury to find some objects on which to raise by Federal tax $8,000,000,000. Now, when these jobs are to be given out there will not be any draft required. Oh, no! They will come from every valley, hilltop, and mountain in the United States, but every one of them will come here with the request, "I want to do my bit to help in this war, but in order to do my bit and help win the war I ought to have a salary of about $1,500 a year," and from that on up. This amendment, gentlemen, ought to prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to reach an agreement for closing debate on this amendment. I ask that it close in 10 minutes.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I would suggest half an hour, 15 minutes on each side.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman from Maine has already consumed 18 minutes, and the gentleman from Indiana, supporting the amendment, has used 8 minutes, and only 5 minutes have been consumed in opposition to it.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Make it 20 minutes on each side.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in 20 minutes, 10 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan and 10 by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment close in 20 minutes, 10 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan and 10 by himself. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] is recognized.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman does not control the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Michigan are in control of the time.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is a good deal in what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] have said with regard to the matter of taking of the special censuses at this time. Personally, I represent an agricultural community. My people are interested in agricultural production, and anything that is going to help them to increase production at this time, when it is increased production that the country wants, I wish to be for if it can be had within anything that is reasonable. I have here the Agricultural Yearbook for 1917. That book contains what I suppose is rather reliable information as to the exact number of bushels of corn produced in the United States, subdivided, giving the number of bushels produced in every State. And the same information is found in that book with regard to wheat, barley, rye, hay, cotton, and everything of that kind.

It gives the number of cattle, the number of horses, the number of hogs, the number of mules and sheep in every State and in the United States. It gives all the information, Mr. Chairman, that it is proposed to secure by the expenditure of millions of dollars in this bill to take an agricultural census.

Now, I submit that, taking corn, for instance, in the State of Missouri, this report shows that they doubled the production of corn last year over 1916. Is it claimed this information is not reliable? The farmers of the United States have been speeding up without a special census. They have been speeding up under the stimulus that comes to every patriotic citizen of America to do all he can to help win the war.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I doubt if after spending several millions of dollars you will have more reliable information, so far as the production of the farms is concerned, than you already have under the organization, the splendid organization, of the Agricultural Department. It does seem to me that we ought not to double up on all these things at a time when the war is demanding that millions of our young men shall give up the vocations of peace and go into the line. While that is on, if we can stop some of this special investigation work, the work requiring large sums of money and a great many people in counting things that could well be deferred, we should do so.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, there will be only one speech on this side, and I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS] to yield some of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. HELM. I announced to the gentleman from Michigan that there will be only one speech on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS] desire to use his time?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I wanted to reserve it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to use it now, because the gentleman from Kentucky announces that there will be but one speech on that side.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Then I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gravamen of the argument advanced by those who insist that we should take a census of agriculture, manufacture, mines, and quarries at this time is that it will be of value to statisticians and political economists. I have followed this debate from its very inception and no one has claimed up to the present moment that a census of agriculture will add one iota in bushels of crop yield when the census is taken three or four years before the statistics are available. As far as manufactures are concerned, it goes without saying that manufacturers do not depend upon statistics to determine their output. The only reason presented by the Bureau of the Census, which was read by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] in the letter from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, did not contain any argument, but merely the opinion that it would be of value.

I would like to know some reason for the extravagant outlay of $7,000,000 when no good will come to the manufacturing interests or the agricultural interests from the compilation of these statistics at the present time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield for a brief question. My time is limited.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman state to this House what value has come to the manufacturing industries of this country by taking a census of the manufactures in the years past?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, those statistics have not been for manufacturers. They have been for statisticians and political economists, and most of the work of the Bureau of Census is of interest only to statisticians and political economists. Mr. Schwab and other great captains of industry do not depend upon statistics to determine whether or not they will go into a certain line of manufactures, nor do the farmers of the country depend upon statistics of agriculture for determining whether they will plant corn or wheat. They plant corn or wheat on the price of those commodities. They raise hogs when there is a prospect that the raising of hogs will be profitable.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Do you believe in taking a census of manufactures?

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe in taking a census of manufactures when conditions are normal, but it is agreed that there is no reason at the present time to take a census of manufactures, because the conditions are utterly abnormal. Will your Dodges and your Fords and your other great manufacturing captains of industry in Detroit determine their position in the future upon these statistics collected in abnormal times? Of course not. They determine their policy upon conditions existing to-day, upon the demand for their products and the sale of their products. It is ridiculous. Is there a man employed in the Ford or the Dodge plant or any other great motor plant in Detroit dependent on statistics to determine whether they will extend or curtail their production? The gentleman can not cite one who resorts to census statistics to determine their production.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. They do it now just as much as ever.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; a very clever answer, because they have never resorted to it, and I have never known a successful manufacturer to resort to statistics collected by the Bureau of the Census, four years old, when they are available four years after being taken, to determine whether they shall extend their business or not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is quite right, so far as the farmers are concerned. These statistics are absolutely valueless. They do not come in until five years after they are taken. The gentleman from Wisconsin is correct. They may be of value to philosophers or economists, but they are of no value to farmers.

Mr. STAFFORD. If there was some value to the Government to-day, well might we spend $7,000,000 for that purpose. But there is proof here that we have as first-class information as is obtainable by the Food Administrator and by the Agricultural Department here in the statistics read by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. He shows that there is available to-day first-hand information, not dusty, obsolete information four years old, as to the amount of acres utilized in the production of the various commodities. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, no good reason has been advanced up to the present time for the expenditure of $7,000,000. It is necessary under the Constitution to have a census of population, but no more, and the burden is upon the committee to show some reason why we should spend the $7,000,000 in these abnormal times when the results will not be of any value even to statisticians. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for one minute.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, it is rather remarkable that there should be an arraignment of the Census Bureau in the last 50 or 100 years, so far as it has any value at all. It is remarkable indeed that this Government should have continuously taken a census of agriculture, manufactures, mines, and quarries all these years and suddenly gentlemen here find out that it is absolutely worthless. That is a strange and significant thing under these circumstances.

Let me say that the book from which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] read is built upon one estimate after another made on the census of 1910.

Mr. GOOD. The production of 1917?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The production of 1917 is made on the basis of estimates, so the man who appeared before the committee stated. Every department said that. There has been no complete census in 1917, no complete census, but on the cursory survey, based upon estimates largely, and not correct. Evidently, it could not be. When men talk this way, extravagantly, about its utter uselessness, it looks to me as if it were unfair treatment of the subject. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HELM. If the gentleman desires an extension of time, I will give it to him.

The CHAIRMAN. All other time has expired. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, it is a very singular situation that confronts the committee, and I am at a perfect loss to understand how it is that the great Republican Party has degenerated into a contest over a census bill for a political issue in the coming election. [Applause.]

If the Republican Party has gotten down to such a fine point that it expects to depend upon the passage or nonpassage of the census bill, including a census of agriculture, manufactures, mines, and quarries, then you are indeed in a desperate condition, gentlemen, a deplorable condition, if you are undertaking to make a campaign issue out of that fact. You have, indeed, arrived at "the irreducible minimum."

Now, let us see. The censuses of 1900 and 1910 were passed by Republican Congresses. They were good then. They certainly ought to be, in your estimation, a good precedent for the passage of a census bill for 1920. The worst feature of this bill is that it is copied after both of those bills that were passed by Republican Congresses and approved by Republican Presidents. If they contain any vice at all, from my viewpoint, it is that they are the offspring of Republican legislation, and why you at this time should undertake to repudiate your own product is something that I can not understand. [Applause.]

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. With pleasure.

Mr. HERSEY. Do you copy from the Republican census bill of 1910 in the way of the appointment of supervisors?

Mr. HELM. My good friend, we are now considering your amendment to section 1.

Mr. HERSEY. Why do not you answer my question?

Mr. HELM. I do not want to punish you. [Laughter.] I think so much of you that I do not want to treat you as your position deserves.

Mr. HERSEY. Do not worry about me, but answer the question.

Mr. HELM. We are discussing——

Mr. HERSEY. Are not you going to answer the question?

Mr. HELM. If you will give me an opportunity to answer it, I will; but if you want to draw a blue print for my answer, why, I will say no. But I will answer your question in my own way, if you will give me an opportunity to do so. The gentleman has offered an amendment to strike out almost the first line of the first section on the first page. If he wants to jump clear over into the back part of the bill and to discuss the last section of it, I will tell you very frankly it has been stated perhaps 500 times that this bill differs from that bill in that respect. Has the gentleman been answered?

Mr. HERSEY. No. Will you yield further?

Mr. HELM. No; I do not think your attitude toward the committee merits it. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Maine is a very delightful gentleman, except when he gets his Maine type of politics stirred up in him. [Laughter.] Individually and personally he is as delightful a gentleman as I ever met or ever hope to meet; but when he gets up here on the floor he gets his quills up and begins to play a little politics over a bill that has no element of politics in it.

Mr. HERSEY. Will you yield for a question?

Mr. HELM. Certainly. I will take one more chance with you.

Mr. HERSEY. Do my questions embarrass you?

Mr. HELM. Get that out of your mind. Nothing that you could ask me about this bill would embarrass me in the least. [Laughter.] Now, let us get back to the bill and the amendment under consideration. I know that every fair-minded man in this Chamber must admit that a census of manufactures, of agriculture, and of mines and quarries is a necessary piece of legislation. Let me make this suggestion to you gentlemen over there who are undertaking to play a little game of politics.

After the close of this war necessarily there will have to be a tariff bill written, and I am disposed to believe that the tariff question following this war will not be a very decisive political issue. We will have to raise a tremendous amount of revenue to pay the interest on this war-bonded debt. Now, in order that a tariff bill may be written, I submit to every fair-minded, candid man here, can you write that bill without knowing what your resources are, what your stock in trade is, and what volume of business we have done?

Mr. HERSEY rose.

Mr. HELM. I do not yield any further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HELM. I hope gentlemen will think over that feature of this situation. Now, I want to submit this other proposition to you: Is there a successful business man conducting a big business proposition in the United States who on the 1st day of January does not take an invoice of his stock? It does not put a pound of any commodity in his establishment. It does not add a single article of value to his stock in his store or in his warehouse. It does not take anything out of it. But how long would a business man continue in business without knowing what his stock consisted of? And that is this proposition exactly. We are undertaking in this bill to take an invoice in 1920 of the stock in trade of this country. Any business man who fails to do the same thing in his own private affairs will soon be out of business.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HELM. With pleasure.

Mr. FESS. I understand the Constitution requires that there be a census taken every 10 years, with reference to the apportionment for Congress.

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. FESS. And you are simply adding to that requirement that we shall also make an inventory of our wealth in addition to the population.

Mr. HELM. We are simply carrying in this bill what has been carried in it since 1820, and I undertake to say that if you did not include a census of agriculture and of manufactures in this bill, the very first thing that would be done at any succeeding session of Congress would be that some one would come on the floor here to introduce just such a measure as this one to take a census of manufactures. The idea of undertaking to do the volume of business that the United States is doing without taking an invoice of the business every 10 years, when an individual takes an invoice of his stock every year and sometimes biennially, is an absurd idea.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I am in sympathy with what the gentleman is saying about adding to the census an inquiry as to these elements of wealth. The only thing I have in mind is that in our food-survey bill of last year we undertake to get our status as to agriculture, and that was said to be annual. Will we not be called upon to repeat that?

Mr. HELM. No. Let me give the gentleman the reason. All of the activities provided for heretofore with reference to agriculture expire June 30, 1919, and the decennial period begins July 1, 1919. So you see that all of the stocktaking and food survey and everything else that has heretofore been provided for expires before this bill even becomes effective, and there is no overlapping, no duplication. As a matter of fact, it is recognized by every department in this Government that the Bureau of the Census is the one bureau that they all depend upon for reliable, accurate information. Here is a letter from the chief of the Bureau of Markets, stating that without the census of agriculture their work is virtually worthless. Now let me give just a little instance. In the food survey they take a few representative families in a community and find out what they have, and multiply it by the number of people in the community.

Mr. FESS. That is a mere estimate.

Mr. HELM. That is a mere estimate. It is just a wild guess. It is the best they can do, and when you have an opportunity to do something that is worth while some gentlemen here are disposed to criticize and throw aside the only real valuable instrument of the Government that we have to get dependable and reliable information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired; all time has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HERSEY) there were 33 ayes and 42 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That during the decennial-census period, and no longer, there may be employed in the Census Office, in addition to the force provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial census period, an assistant director, who shall be an experienced practical statistician; a chief statistician, who shall be a person of known and tried experience in statistical work; a disbursing clerk; an appointment clerk; a private secretary to the director; 4 stenographers; 8 expert chiefs of division; and 15 statistical experts. The assistant director shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The chief statistician, the disbursing clerk, the appointment clerk, the chiefs of divisions, and the private secretary to the director shall be appointed without examination by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census. The statistical experts and the stenographers shall be appointed in conformity with the civil-service act and rules.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether it is practicable to designate the 1st day of July next preceding the census by naming the year. In the language as reported by the committee it says "for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial-census period." That compels a mental calculation. Is it practicable to designate the 1st of July of the year intended.

Mr. HELM. I see no objection to saying July 1, 1919.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that would be an improvement?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is in accordance with the language of existing law. The language is, "for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial-census period."

Mr. STAFFORD. I realize that it has to be indefinite or continuing language, because this bill is not seeking to take the Fourteenth Census only but succeeding censuses; but I suppose the date extended is July 1, 1919.

Mr. HELM. I do not think there is anything indefinite about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would be a little more definite if we named the year. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "division" strike out the semicolon, insert a period, and in lines 16 and 17 strike out the words "and 15 statistical experts."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HERSEY) there were 13 ayes and 23 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3 as follows: Strike out, in lines 21 and 22, the words "without examination"; strike out, in line 23, the words "The statistical experts" and all of lines 24 and 25 and insert the following in lieu thereof: "That all appointments made or to be made pursuant to the provisions of this act shall be made in accordance with the provisions and requirements of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883: Provided, however, That no male citizen shall be appointed under the provisions of this act who at the time of his appointment is within the age limit rendering him liable to draft for the military service of the United States: And provided further, That whenever an appointee under this act becomes of the age which renders him liable to military service of the United States he shall by reason of that fact be forthwith released from service in connection with his appointment under this act."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of this amendment is to put this bill and the appointees under it within the provisions of the civil-service act. There is no reason why they should not be within the civil-service requirements as to efficiency, and there is every good reason why they should be. The establishment of a standard for this service ought not to be treated as a political question in any sense of the word.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman or anybody believe that anyone would take a civil-service examination for a job lasting two or three weeks?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; because the examination could be made to suit the character of the employment. This same question was up when the last census was taken. The bill was vetoed by President Roosevelt for that very reason. I have his whole veto message, which is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1966, of 1909, and I want to read a little of it, because it is refreshing to go back and see how the law has been developed and protected through the efforts of a Republican President. We have heard the statement made that that was a Republican census bill, and it has also been charged against the Republicans that probably they were attempting to manipulate that act and the appointments on political grounds. Now, in section 7 of this bill you will find all the appointments removed from civil service, and in section 10 of that bill is to be found the antagonism to the whole principle of civil service in its most flagrant form. President Roosevelt's veto of the census act of 1909, in part, reads as follows:

Section 7 of the act provides in effect that appointments to the census shall be under the spoils system, for this is the real meaning of the provision that they shall be subject only to noncompetitive examination. The proviso is added that they shall be selected without regard to political party affiliations. But there is only one way to guarantee that they shall be selected without regard to politics and on merit, and that is by choosing them after competitive examination from the lists of eligibles provided by the Civil Service Commission. The present Director of the Census in his last report states the exact fact about these noncompetitive examinations when he says:

"A noncompetitive examination means that every one of the many thousands who will pass the examinations will have an equal right to appointment, and that personal and political pressure must in the end, as always before, become the determining factor with regard to the great body of these temporary employments. I can not too earnestly urge that the Director of the Census be relieved from this unfortunate situation."

To provide that the clerks and other employees shall be appointed after noncompetitive examination, and yet to provide that they shall be selected without regard to political party affiliations, means merely that the appointments shall be treated as the perquisites of the politicians of both political parties instead of as the perquisites of the politicians of one party. I do not believe in the doctrine that to the victor belong the spoils; but I think even less of the doctrine that the spoils shall be divided without a fight by the professional politicians on both sides; and this would be the result of permitting the bill in its present shape to become a law.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Just for a question.

Mr. ASWELL. Is it not a fact that a Republican Congress later enacted this law and appointed these people without the civil service?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; they did not. I have the law here.

Mr. ASWELL. The fact is that they did.

Mr. ROBBINS. I shall not bandy words with the gentleman about that; the law will speak for itself. I continue the reading:

Both of the last two censuses, the Eleventh and the Tenth Censuses, were taken under a provision of law excluding competition; that is, necessitating appointments being made under the spoils system. Every man competent to speak with authority because of his knowledge of and familiarity with the work of those censuses has stated that the result was to produce extravagance and demoralization.

Mr. Robert T. Porter, who took the census of 1890, states:

The efficiency of the decennial census would be greatly improved and its cost materially lessened if it were provided that the employees should be selected in accordance with the terms of the civil-service law.

There, now, I have cited to you not only a former President of the United States but two Directors of the Census, stating that it ought to be taken under the civil-service law by employees selected pursuant to its terms. The gentlemen know that the civil-service law was the result of 40 or 50 years' struggle for the betterment of the civil service of our Government, and that the Republicans were in power when the civil-service law was enacted, and that it was enacted because it was believed that that party—or any party—in power would abuse the right of appointment to public office and use public office for political spoils. Mr. Chairman, the worst feature in this bill is not, perhaps, the selection of these minor appointees outside of the civil service. That is bad enough; that will "produce extravagant demoralization" of the service, in the language of Director Porter—and everyone will acknowledge that he was a distinguished gentleman, a scholar, and a patriot. It will produce inefficiency also. Let us turn to page 10 of the bill, to which this amendment will also apply. We find there that the majority party in this House have not only increased the number of supervisors, who are presumably to be the representatives of the Census Bureau, taking the census in each congressional district, from 330 to 400, but they have also made them appointees of the Secretary of Commerce, on the recommendation of the Director of the Census! Think of that! That takes all of these officials who will select all the enumerators, and who, in turn, will be in charge of the actual work of the taking of the census, and will be responsible for its accuracy and faithfulness as to all the facts, out from under the civil-service law. Under all prior census laws the supervisors were appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, but in this bill the Secretary of Commerce is to make these appointments. It would appear as if the majority party do not trust their own President! It may be argued that this will entail too much work upon the Civil Service Commission.

I took occasion to inquire into that. I hold no brief for the Civil Service Commission. I am speaking of it as a Member of Congress, regardless of whether the principle of making appointments under that law is to be applied here to a set of Democratic officials to take the census or a set of Republican officials. I believe in the system. I want to say to the gentlemen who are going to oppose this amendment that I was in Congress when Mr. McKinley was President, when the civil-service law did not apply to the appointment of postmasters. I represented a congressional district where there was over 300 post offices to be filled by appointment of the President on the recommendation of the Member of Congress. That was the greatest burden and the greatest cause of dissatisfaction and criticism that I ever had to deal with in all my experience in public life, politically, professionally, or otherwise. Those who sought these appointments or their friends were after me morning, noon, and night about these post offices. The communities where they were located at times became interested and divided, so intense in some cases did these contests become. Happily that has all been eliminated and none of us are now troubled since the Civil Service Commission has been placed in charge of these appointments, and the results have been eminently satisfactory. Can the Civil Service Commission perform this work? I think I have shown conclusively by the testimony of a former President and of two former census directors that can not be denied or seriously questioned by those who are experienced in this matter that all these positions ought to be placed under the civil-service law. If the civil service can furnish the lists of eligibles from which to select these appointees, why should anyone object. I took occasion to call up the Civil Service Commission on the 22d of June and inquire as to the ability of the commission to furnish suitable lists of persons eligible for these places, and I received from the commission the following letter:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1918.

Hon. EDWARD E. ROBBINS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. ROBBINS: I inclose herewith copy of my letter of May 9, 1918, to Hon. HARVEY HELM, chairman of the Committee on the Census of the House of Representatives. The references in this letter are to the committee print of the bill, which was then under consideration.

I know of no good reason why appointments to the census force should not fairly and properly be made under the civil-service rules and regulations. The commission is amply able to do the work.

Very respectfully,

JOHN A. MCILHENNY,
President.

Inclosure.

Let us turn to the work that this Civil Service Commission is doing. It has a large building here in the city of Washington, and many employees, all of which are essential to one of the great departments of our Government. They hold examinations all over the country, and lately we modified the rules so that they can examine in Washington anyone, provided the party applying for the examination can show that he or she is entitled to it, and can be charged to some congressional district in the United States, and have a legal domicile other than in the city of Washington. During the last year—and I now read from the annual report of 1917, page 7, of the Civil Service Commission—it examined and certified appointments as follows: In the field, 174,653 applicants, and in Washington, 35,765; and there was appointed to office from this list thus certified to governmental departments persons qualified to fill the positions that were asked to be filled, as follows: Outside of Washington, 78,528, and in Washington, 6,761. We have their word, as expressed in the above letter, that they can furnish eligible lists of persons duly qualified for all these places in the Census Bureau. I appeal, therefore, to the majority party in control here not to force this bill through and make these places all political spoils. "To the victor belongs the spoils" is no longer a popular political slogan. Destroy the merit system, and you will find these appointments coming home to plague you politically in your congressional districts, because for every man that you appoint to office you will have five or six that are displeased.

Mr. COX. Oh, 50.

Mr. ROBBINS. And the men you put in will be snugly sitting on their salaries and the five or six whom you will disappoint will lie awake nights on your political trail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], who is the chairman of this committee and in charge of this bill, is something of a humorist, I notice in his reply to the questions of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY]. I want to lift this discussion to the plane of real serious debate and out of the hustings of popular politics, because it does not make any difference to me, politically or otherwise, whether you make this the "spoils system" or not. We Republicans will obtain control of the Government in due time, no difference what is the fate of this amendment, and, therefore, we expect no profit or advantage politically or otherwise by this bill. No department of our great and splendid Government enjoys to a larger extent the confidence and respect of all of our people than the Civil Service Commission.

President Roosevelt vetoed a pension bill enacted by a Republican Congress, because the places created thereby were not under its eligible list; President Cleveland stood firmly for its enforcement and announced that "public office was a public trust;" President Wilson has extended by Executive order the civil-service law to many offices not formerly covered by its provisions, and this House should not now curtail its operation by placing those who are to take the Fourteenth Census beyond the pale of its scrutinizing tests. But I do plead with you who are in the majority to preserve this civil-service law. The temporary advantage of striking it down will not benefit any political party and it will be a demoralization to the public service of our country that we as patriots ought not to tolerate or encourage. [Applause.]

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, all of the employees of the Census Bureau are now under civil service, and this bill provides that those employed in the bureau shall be under civil service, and it applies only to those in the field service, as suggested by the gentleman who has just spoken. Mr. Chairman, it is recognized that while the Constitution places the responsibility in time of war upon the President, this Congress has ungrudgingly and without stint given the President ample authority. The same principle applies to any business. Any man in charge of a great business industry, whether it be merchandise, manufacturing, or farming, the man who is responsible for the success of that institution must have authority. The director should have authority over the appointees. Put them under the control of the Senate, and they ignore the director at will, and the work fails. The claim has been made by the gentleman who has just spoken and by others that supervisors, who are to serve only a short period of time, should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. In just a moment. I call the attention of this committee to this fact, that the Director of the Census is charged with the responsibility of making this decennial census a success. He is held accountable for the results of this work, and if this Congress holds him responsible, why, does it not stand to reason that he should be given opportunity and authority? It has been charged that the Director of the Census and the Secretary of Commerce are well-known ordinary politicians and therefore should not have the right to make these appointments. I call the attention of this committee to the fact that those two gentlemen, the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, and the Director of the Census, Mr. Rogers, received their appointment by the President and were confirmed by the Senate, and to the gentleman's argument that the danger is that they will appoint politicians. I call attention to the fact that they themselves, the very gentlemen Members on this floor have been criticizing, received their appointments from the President and were confirmed by the Senate. [Applause.] So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the claim that these temporary workers, some of them schoolboys, some of them women, some of them men, who have opportunity to work for only two or three weeks, it seems to me that it would be ridiculous to call upon them to go to the trouble and expense of taking the civil-service examination when this bill provides that the Director of the Census himself shall give examinations to such extent as will absolutely guarantee the fitness of each individual in taking the census. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I yield.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have before me the act of 1909, and the gentleman does not want to misquote it. The law reads this way on this point:

Supervisors shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

This bill reads that "the supervisors shall be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census," on page 10. Does the gentleman mistrust his President and will not allow him to make these appointments? Is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. ASWELL. This section has nothing to do with supervisors.

Mr. ROBBINS. But it amounts to the same thing, because my amendment puts everything under the civil service.

Mr. ASWELL. That is where the gentleman's amendment is wrong.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is not right; that will not answer the question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would call the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana to the fact that under section 6—

That in addition to the force hereinbefore provided for and to that authorized by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial census period, there may be employed in the Census Office during the decennial census period, and no longer, as many clerks with salaries, etc., as may be found necessary for the proper and prompt performance of the duties herein required.

Section 7 provides—

That the additional clerks and other employees provided for by section 6 shall be subject to such special test examinations as the Director of the Census may prescribe, the said examinations to be conducted by the United States Civil Service Commission, to be open to all applicants without regard to political party affiliations, and to be held in such places in each State as may be designated by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is simply examinations by the commissioner himself.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Civil-service examinations.

Mr. ROBBINS. The commissioner has the right and he prepares the questions.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Has the gentleman read all of the Civil Service Commissioner's letter?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; I did not read the first paragraph because it referred to another letter, but I can read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HELM. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania relates to two different subjects, one the Civil Service Commission and the other the appointment of persons liable to military service.

Mr. ROBBINS. Oh, the gentleman probably did not understand it if he did not read it and simply heard it. It simply says that no man can be appointed to a position liable to the draft.

Mr. HELM. I think everybody wants to agree to that, but I do not think everybody wants to agree to the civil-service feature of it, and therefore I ask for a division of the question presented by the amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, in order that I may be perfectly well understood, and that the gentleman may not misunderstand the amendment, I will say that it only provides for putting the positions under civil service and provides that no man can go in there that is liable to military service.

Mr. HELM. There are two very distinct propositions involved in that.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield at that point for a question?

Mr. ROBBINS. You can not divide the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it can be divided.

Mr. STAFFORD. May we have the amendment again reported?

Mr. ROBBINS. May we have it read again so that we will all understand it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. My understanding is that there is no objection to the last proposition. Does the gentleman want to oppose it? We are willing to concede the second proposition, but we are not in favor of the first proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the first part of the amendment.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, the first part of the amendment, as I understand it, relates to the civil-service feature. I ask for a separate vote on that. I want to be heard for five minutes, or less time.

The staff officials of the Director of the Census are the assistant director, the chief statistician, the disbursing clerk, the appointment clerk, the chiefs of divisions, and private secretary to the director. Now, let us look at that just a moment. Would any man in Congress want his private secretary appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROBBINS. I except the director's private secretary.

Mr. HELM. You except the private secretary?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. HELM. And not the assistant secretary's secretary?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; not the assistant secretary's.

Mr. HELM. That looks like an absurd proposition on its face. The assistant director has charge of the office force and perhaps 80,000 to 100,000 appointees, and has to possess administrative ability to handle men and to direct the business; and to require such assistant director to be put under the civil-service rules is an unthinkable proposition to me. You might just as well say that the director should be appointed under civil-service rules and regulations. Men who handle this type of business are men who have initiative and administrative capacity, and to undertake to say that a man who gets a high standing on a civil-service examination shall be put at the head of a bureau is a most unbusinesslike proposition. It would be almost as reasonable to appoint the higher officers of the Army and Navy by competitive civil-service examination. And, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], you would have to confine yourself to the age limit under the civil-service rules and regulations.

Now, as to these statisticians. These men, who are to direct and to digest and who are to coordinate all of the data that is brought to that office, have been in that office for a period of years, and have had training along a particular line of duty. You can not go into the States and pick up at random a man who is qualified to act as chief statistician whose sole and only qualification is his ability to successfully take a civil-service examination. The work in the bureau is divided into three or four separate divisions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. HELM. In just a moment. In the Division of Population there are 2,000 clerks; in the Division of Agriculture there are 1,000 clerks; and in the Division of Manufacturing, Mines, and Quarries, 1,000 clerks. That is the office force and not the field force. Now, do you want to just pick a man at random and put him in charge of 2,000 men who are assembling data and getting it in an intelligent form? It would be an unbusinesslike procedure. It is not good common sense. And I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS], on reflection and further consideration, will see that these statisticians are men of different capacity and different training, and that we do not want to cripple the service by requiring the impossible.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume from the gentleman's statement that the chief statistician is a statistical expert?

Mr. HELM. The chief statistician is a——

Mr. STAFFORD. Should be a statistical expert?

Mr. HELM. As a matter of fact, he ought to be the very highest type of statistician.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, you provide in your bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, you require the statistical expert authorized by this section to be subject to civil-service examination. Why not require the chief to be subject to the same requirement? Why allow him to be a creature of spoils?

Mr. HELM. The chief statistician?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Well, the gentleman from Wisconsin can certainly draw a line of distinction between a man who is directing such a large organization as the statistical branches in the Bureau of Census and his subordinates?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can draw this distinction, if the gentleman will permit, that the chief statistician should be under the same rigorous examination as to qualifications, and more so, than the subordinate statistical experts which the gentleman's own committee require to be under civil-service rules.

Mr. HELM. Now, as a matter of fact, the chiefs of the divisions of population, agriculture, manufacture, mines, and quarries are men who are and have been in the bureau and do have a civil-service status, so far as that is concerned. But——

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the very purpose, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. HELM. But if anything should happen and any one of these men should die, to require the director to hold a civil-service examination to select a man to be placed in charge of a force such as this seems to me to be——

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the very point I am trying to bring out, if the gentleman will permit, in all seriousness. Under the existing law, on the statutory roll there are carried nine chiefs of divisions that are subject to civil-service rules. Now you bring in a bill where you provide that the statistical experts of the census only shall be subject to civil-service rules, but you do not provide that these eight expert chiefs of divisions shall be under civil-service rules. Yet he was not placed on the statutory roll. They are required to be on the census roll.

Mr. HELM. Let us not meet that until it is presented, Mr. Chairman. I ask for a vote.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROBBINS. An amendment is pending.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact: The last proviso in his amendment is as follows:

Provided further, That whenever an appointee under this act becomes of the age which renders him liable to the military service of the United States, he shall, by reason of that fact, forthwith be released from service in connection with said appointment.

I hardly think the gentleman realizes the effect of that. In other words, if the military age remains as it is and a man under 21 years of age is appointed to any position, although it may be that of a mere enumerator, whose services would not be required for more than three weeks, yet if in the middle of that work he becomes of the age of 21, he is immediately liable to military service, and he must quit his position and some one else must be appointed to take his place, although he might not be called to service for months.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I thought of that, and I made that flexible, so as to cover the possible draft age from 18 to 45, according to the amendment now pending in the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. If a man happens to arrive at military age, he might not be called for service for six months, and yet on the very day he reaches military age he would have to be released from employment.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is the only way I can see to safeguard against getting a lot of slackers.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SUMNERS. The point is that this question is not now before the House. The gentleman is discussing one part of the amendment and another part is pending.

Mr. BARKLEY. It strikes me that this amendment should not be agreed to in that form.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not believe in agreeing to it except by a division of the question. I think the amendment should be divided and the two parts separated. If the party recommended is called into the service of the United States, then——

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think that is needed. These positions are not exempted from the military service. There is no place that a man holds that exempts him unless his chief states that his services are indispensable. But if it is necessary to amend the act so as to make it sure that they are not exempted, no objection could be made to that. I do not care to see any of these positions filled by men of military age, but if a man who is of military age and who has been examined and rejected and could not get into the Army is transferred to some job in here, he would have to be immediately removed.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no objection to the principle of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no objection to the principle; but it will work out, as I believe, unwisely.

Mr. ASWELL. Is it not a fact that the Army regulations control that? The whole amendment, in that case, would be useless. Under it you could not employ anybody in the bureau anywhere unless he was under 18 or over 45.

Mr. BARKLEY. Suppose we should take a man within military age, over 25 years old, as an enumerator. He would not require more than three weeks to perform his duty in the district assigned to him. He might not be called into service for three months. It strikes me that it is an undue precaution to require that men shall be disconnected from the service when they have reached military age, although not called into service. I think it would be sufficient to provide that appointment under this act shall not entitle any man to deferred classification or exemption from military service.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the principle involved in the amendment which proposes that men to be employed shall be outside of military age, and I hope that something of the kind will be approved by the committee. I am not concerned as to the words or as to the amendment being adopted in the exact words suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS]; but as to the objection made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], I think his objection is not good. I think the administration of this act should be in the direction of refusing to employ men within the age which subjects men to military service, and then the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky would not obtain. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Kentucky says also that employment in this line of work does not exempt a man from military service. That is true; but this employment gives opportunity for the head of the department or the official to whom this employee is subject to ask for his deferred classification on account of his employment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I know of a department in this Government employing thousands of men in positions that do not exempt them from military service. I know also that the head of that department has asked for deferred classification for thousands of those men on account of their employment. It is up to the head of the department. The employment itself does not exempt a man, but the head of a department has authority to ask the draft boards to place men in deferred classes, and no draft board disregards the request of the head of a department.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would the gentleman's suggestion be corrected by providing, instead of eliminating anybody who might arrive at military age, an amendment that would make it impossible for the Director of the Census or anybody under him to ask for a deferred classification for a man of military age?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I want it air-tight. I am not concerned, as I said, about the words, but I think it is up to this Congress now—it should have been done before—to provide that these places we are creating should not be filled by men within draft age. The Congress is coming to that state of feeling. It should have experienced that feeling earlier. It ought to give expression to it now.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think that provision in substance has been adopted in several bills that have been passed already.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have some of the bills here.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes; but the gentleman from Kentucky suggests another form, a form that I do not approve.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not concerned as to the form, but I can foresee a ridiculous situation that might arise with people arriving at military age, when their duties would not require more than a month's service, and yet they would immediately be disconnected from their duties, although they would not be called into service for months.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It would be easy to frame the amendment in such words that that difficulty could not arise.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it would be wise to eliminate from the appointment of these men those who are liable to military service, but if anybody is appointed who is not liable to military service I do not think a worthy object could be effected by separating that person immediately from his position before he is called to the military service.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I will state to the gentleman that I have just left the Senate, where an amendment is being considered to put within the draft age every man between the ages of 18 and 45. If that law were passed it would make it difficult to secure the necessary number of enumerators.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I doubt if that amendment will be adopted by Congress, particularly at this time.

Mr. HELM. If anybody will present a well-considered amendment along the line of the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan, I do not think there will be a particle of doubt about the adoption of it. The only question is in getting the amendment in proper shape.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Pardon me for a moment. When the Agricultural bill was under consideration I offered an amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would an amendment to the second portion of the amendment offered be in order at this stage of the proceedings?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. It is divisible. The gentleman from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. The chairman has decided that this amendment is divisible, but after the committee has acted on the first portion of the amendment, will the second portion be open to debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Then I do not care to proceed further at this time. I have nothing to say as to the first part.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, can we have the first part reported as the Chair has divided it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

First part of the amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania: Strike out, in line 23, the words "The statistical experts and the stenographers shall be appointed in conformity with civil-service act and rules" and insert the following in lieu thereof: "That all appointments made or to be made pursuant to the provisions of this act, except the private secretary to the Director, shall be made in accordance with the provisions and requirements of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883, and the rules and regulations made thereunder."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. ROBBINS) there were—ayes 22, noes 35.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move to strike out the words "become of the age which renders him liable" and insert in lieu thereof the words "whenever called into."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD to the second part of the amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Strike out the words "become of the age which renders him liable;" and insert in lieu thereof the words "whenever called into."

Mr. STAFFORD. So that it will read——

Mr. ROBBINS. Let the Clerk read the whole amendment as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

So that it will read:

"Provided, however, That no male citizen shall be appointed under the provisions of this act who at the time of his appointment is within the age limit rendering him liable to draft for the military service of the United States: And provided further, That whenever appointed under this act, whenever called into the military service of the United States"——

Mr. HEFLIN. The first part ought all to be stricken out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my amendment for the purpose of redrafting it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws the amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the amendment, if I may be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. BORLAND. I am in full sympathy with what I believe to be the purpose of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, and I hope he will get his amendment into such form that we can all agree upon it. His purpose is to prohibit men using these census positions as safety-first jobs during the war. We are all in hearty sympathy with that purpose, I think. It seems to me that men will be appointed to positions under this census who are of military age, but there is no reason why their appointment, whether they have actively sought it or not, should exempt them from the military service that is common to all American citizens of their age.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the first part of the second clause of the amendment no man of military age can be appointed.

Mr. BORLAND. And that is exactly the difficulty with it. The language is so drastic in its nature that no man of military age could be appointed. Under the present wording of it, no man between 21 and 31 could be appointed to the service; and if the military age were enlarged from 18 to 45, then it would be extremely difficult to get a working force under this census bureau of men not within military age. But the purpose can all be accomplished by permitting freedom of appointment in accordance with the civil-service regulations, but refusing any exemption on the ground of necessary employment to men who are in that line of service. It does seem to me that either by oversight of Congress or by slipping up on the soft side of executive officers a large number of men who ought to be subject to military service, like any other good citizens of the United States, have been exempted from military service. It is not at all creditable that that sort of thing has gone on to any extent.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. Would not that objection be obviated by appointing women to the places?

Mr. BORLAND. I have no doubt that a large number of women will be appointed. It is unquestionably true that women are in many respects as well or better adapted to office work than men. But there will be a great many of these positions, such as enumerators, and places of that kind, which can not very well be filled by women. I take it that there will be a large number of men, notwithstanding the very general employment of women in this service.

Mr. WHEELER. If I understand the first part of this amendment correctly, a man 25 years of age who had only one leg could not be appointed to this service, because he is within the military age.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. If it simply excludes men of military age the gentleman from Illinois is correct. A man of military age must be refused appointment, even though not qualified for military service.

And that brings before us another thought that must be prominent in our minds from now on for the immediate future. It is that most of these Government employments ought to be open to men who have performed military service and who bear the scars of battle. Men who have been crippled in the service—one-legged soldiers, one-armed soldiers—can do a great deal of this kind of work. As far as I am concerned, when any place in the Federal service is open that a man crippled in this war can fill, he will be the first man who will have my voice for the place. I think general legislation will probably be passed which will enable the civil service to be open to self-respecting and patriotic Americans who have been crippled in the military service, who come back here bearing the scars of this great war for democracy. Those men ought to be put in. We can amend this so that men liable to military service and who are called upon for military service shall promptly go into the military service, as other American citizens go. Then there can be no evil concealed in this law. I think that is the full purpose and scope of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama. I think his purpose is a very proper one, and I hope he has got his amendment in such shape that we can all agree upon it with that idea in our minds.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the second part of the Robbins amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have modified the amendment, after consultation with the gentleman in charge of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for second part of the amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: "Provided, That no man appointed or employed or who shall hereafter be appointed or employed under this act shall on account of such employment be certified by any official or authority for deferred classification under act No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917, or under any act amendatory thereof that has been or shall hereafter be enacted."

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the substitute for the Robbins amendment unless the amendment permits the soldiers who have been in the service and been discharged for disability, or who have been rejected on account of physical disability. I do not think we ought to put up a bar against soldiers who have been in the service and have been disabled or been honorably discharged, or put up a bar to those of military age who have been rejected by examining boards.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. My amendment will meet the situation the gentleman has in mind. It will not prevent the employment of disabled soldiers, it simply provides that no one shall be employed under this act who, on account of his employment, has been certified by deferred classification under the act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman interpret his amendment so that it would not bar anybody that should not be given a deferred classification?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Anyone could be appointed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Anybody that came back from the service could be appointed?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. He could.

Mr. HELM. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken and the substitute was agreed to.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, after the word "rules," insert the following: "Provided further, That wherever practicable women shall be employed in the positions herein provided for."

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, as has been suggested on the floor, these are positions in which women can perform the services very easily. Women can do the work of enumerators. It has been found that women who have been employed as tenement-house inspectors were able to do the work as efficiently as men. The detailed work necessary in these positions would be faithfully performed by women. This amendment, if adopted, would also prevent men who are needed in war work from being employed in this bureau.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the fact that women have full right to do this work the same as men now have under the bill, without any such amendment as has been offered by the lady from Montana.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to my friend from Louisiana who has just said that women would undoubtedly be given an opportunity for employment that the fact is, however, that there are some men who prefer to employ men in work of this character, and therefore unless we provide for the appointment of women when practicable they are not likely to get the positions. Undoubtedly in some cases men will be recommended and appointed for political purposes, because of their political influence. In this time of war and stress when man power is so greatly needed on the fighting line or in the heavy, active, essential work of the war, the women of the country should be given an opportunity, so far as it is possible to do so, to do the work which they can do just as well as men. In the taking of the census women will be found as efficient and capable as men, and therefore I favor the amendment of the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN], which provides that they shall be employed so far as is practicable.

Mr. ASWELL. They have the opportunity now, have they not?

Mr. MONDELL. They have the opportunity, but without some such suggestion as this, some expression of legislative opinion they are not likely to get the jobs.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Unless there is some advice to the appointing officers indicating the view of Congress in this matter, women are not likely to be appointed in considerable number. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ASWELL. This census is to be taken in 1920, and by that time undoubtedly a large number of crippled soldiers will be here. Would the gentleman eliminate them from this work?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all. This amendment would not eliminate crippled soldiers. So far as it is practicable to employ crippled soldiers by all manner of means they should be employed.

Mr. ASWELL. This amendment does not say anything about crippled soldiers.

Mr. MONDELL. This amendment does not relate to that particular matter. This amendment refers to the employment of women. I should be glad to have it amended to include honorably discharged soldiers.

Mr. ASWELL. Would the gentleman suggest that this Congress go on record specifying any class of citizens in work of this kind?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; proper specification.

Mr. ASWELL. When all classes are admitted into this work?

Mr. MONDELL. We frequently grant preference to soldiers, and in time of war it is our duty to appoint for clerical work people who are not available for military service or heavy productive work.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I want to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill if the amendment of the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] would be satisfactory if we added to it "and crippled soldiers," so that it would read, "that so far as practicable, women and crippled soldiers shall be employed"?

Mr. HEFLIN. Does not the gentleman think that the amendment would be better if it said "may be employed"?

Mr. GOOD. If that would be satisfactory to the gentleman, I should be glad to so amend it.

Mr. ASWELL. If the gentleman is asking me the question. I should say that it would be entirely out of the proprieties or the proper thing in any sense to specify any class of citizens when everyone should have a chance to do the work.

Mr. HEFLIN. It seems to me that the amendment would be better if it read "may be appointed" instead of "shall be appointed."

Mr. MONDELL. This is simply a preference. The appointing power is not compelled to appoint women exclusively. Women are to be given the preference wherever it is practicable so to do.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not barely possible that the women may wield some political influence about the time these offices open up?

Mr. MONDELL. I think they may, and it may prove just as wise politically to appoint women to these positions as to appoint men. This legislative suggestion will be along that line, but, apart from all political considerations, this is the time to utilize the services of the women of the country in all lines of endeavor to which they are adapted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They have that influence in Montana now.

Mr. MONDELL. And in Wyoming.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In Wyoming.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment offered by the lady from Montana by adding the words "and disabled soldiers" after the word "women."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD to the amendment offered by Miss RANKIN: After the word "women" insert the words "and disabled soldiers," so that the amendment as amended would read:

"Provided further, That wherever practicable women and disabled soldiers shall be employed in the positions herein provided for."

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute for the amendment of the lady from Montana and the amendment to the amendment that it read "disabled soldiers and sailors."

Mr. GOOD. I would be very glad to accept that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. My substitute goes to the amendment of the lady from Montana, and also the amendment offered to the amendment by the gentleman from Iowa, and I would strike out the amendment offered and substitute the one that I have suggested.

Mr. GOOD. I will ask the gentleman if he would not modify his amendment by including those honorably discharged.

Mr. HELM. I understand that the amendment is by way of substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That wherever practicable disabled soldiers and sailors shall be employed in the positions herein provided for.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman who offered the last amendment intend to strike out the word "women"?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to offer this as a substitute to strike out "women" and make it apply to disabled soldiers and sailors.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi as a substitute for the amendment offered by the lady from Montana: Page 2, line 25, after the word "ruled," insert the following: "Provided further, That wherever practicable disabled soldiers and sailors shall be employed in the positions herein provided for."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] has great merit. It has such merit, it seems to me, that it can not be sneered off the floor of this House in any such manner as is attempted here now. If the gentleman will send to the folding room and secure a copy of the war labor laws of Great Britain, printed under a resolution offered by Senator HOLLIS, he will find that in Great Britain the labor unions have welcomed the employment of female labor in practically all of the great munition plants and in all of the industries. Wherever women can be employed in Great Britain and in France during the war, they are employed to take the place of men. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, if adopted, will serve notice on the Director of the Census, even where practical, he must not employ women.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Because the effect of his amendment is to reject the amendment offered by the lady from Montana to utilize a great body of women wherever practical, and that is all her amendment would accomplish.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Ought not the gentleman's amendment to have soldiers and sailors?

Mr. GOOD. I was going to add that. If this amendment is adopted, I shall ask to modify my amendment so it will read "honorably discharged soldiers and sailors." The man who is honorably discharged, who has performed his military service over there, if he can be employed to do this work, and is competent to do it and is not fully capable of doing some other and harder work, he ought to have the opportunity to be so employed. And it seems to me while this war is on we ought to utilize wherever we can the women power of America for doing this very class of work, especially clerical work, and thereby relieve the men to fight the battles of the Republic. They are all needed, and we should come to this position at once.

Mr. ASWELL. Is it not a fact this bill provides that now? There is nothing in the bill to prohibit it, and is it not the fact that women are being utilized throughout the entire country here? There is nothing in the bill to prevent that. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. I think the Congress ought to emphasize the fact that women should be employed to a greater extent than they are now, so that men not within draft age can go and take the plow and help speed up production, can take to the factory, where he can do work that women can not do so well, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi will be defeated.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I notice the gentleman would make a preference given to women and disabled soldiers and sailors?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Now, where would the preference come? Would women come before the disabled soldiers and sailors, or disabled soldiers and sailors before women? In other words, who will have——

Mr. GOOD. That will be left entirely to the Director of the Census.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The women will be appointed first, and then if there are any places left, give them to the soldiers and sailors?

Mr. GOOD. Not necessarily so. I take it that the Director of the Census will be a man with red blood in his veins, and if he had a job that could be performed better by a woman than by a disabled soldier or sailor, he will appoint the woman, and if the work could be done better by a disabled soldier or sailor, he will appoint him.

Mr. ASWELL. The Director of the Census makes the statement already that he intends to do that. Now, what is the use of this legislation?

Mr. GOOD. He intends to take a census, then what is the use of passing this census law?

Mr. ASWELL. You will have to have some authority to take the census——

Mr. GOOD. I think the Congress ought to direct in matters of this kind, and especially when it comes to directing as to the speeding-up program.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the substitute in order first?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is to perfect an amendment before voting on a substitute, and the Chair is right.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so it will read "honorably discharged soldiers and sailors."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent——

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I agree to that amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "women" insert "disabled and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors."

Mr. GOOD. I ask to strike out "disabled" because they would be honorably discharged.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert "honorably discharged soldiers and sailors."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, may we have that reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa should stand, an honorably discharged soldier or sailor would be in the same class as a disabled soldier or sailor honorably discharged?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it comes within his prerogative to construe what the amendment might be, and therefore declines.

Mr. HEFLIN. But he might not be disabled while he might be included in this——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not feel called upon to construe——

Mr. HEFLIN (continuing). And be put on the same footing with the disabled.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry along the same line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. If the amendment should be adopted then there would be no preference in the employment of women; that is, if the substitute be adopted?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Only for disabled soldiers and sailors.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not construe the law as to that.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my substitute by adding "disabled soldiers and sailors honorably discharged."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi offers to modify his amendment as follows: After the word "sailors" insert the words "honorably discharged."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi by way of substitute to the amendment offered by the lady from Montana.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GOOD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 35.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Miss RANKIN and Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 33, noes 45.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the lady from Montana as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, nays, none.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Line 23, page 2, before the word "statistical," insert "chiefs of division."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 2, line 23, before the word "statistical," insert the words "chiefs of division."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on the statutory roll there are employed at the present time nine expert chiefs of division. Those expert chiefs of division are under the classified service. I can understand wherein the Democratic side would wish to have the appointment clerk, the assistant director, and the chief statistician, perhaps, without civil-service requirements; but still the gentleman, if he provides for statistical experts under the civil-service rule as is provided in this last sentence, should be willing to include chiefs of division. There are eight chiefs of division provided for in this bill. There can be no distinction between the respective character of the work. If statistical experts should be under classified service, certainly these chiefs of division should likewise be. And I hope the gentleman will see the consistency of supporting this amendment in view of the report of the committee favoring statistical experts being included under civil-service rules.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, you would then have in line 20 that chiefs of divisions and a private secretary should be appointed without examination by the Secretary, and in line 23 you would have chiefs of divisions, stratistical experts, and stenographers to be appointed in conformity with the civil-service acts and rules.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not get the gentleman's first statement, if he will permit.

Mr. HELM. He would have chiefs of divisions in line 20 to be appointed by the director.

Mr. STAFFORD. I intend to strike those out if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HELM. There is a broad distinction, and I hope the committee will listen to me, between the chief of a division in the Census Bureau and a statistical expert. The chief of a division such as manufactures or of agriculture takes a man of exceptional qualification and exceptional administrative ability. When one stops to think, he will see that there are about 3,000,000 manufactories in the United States, and a man to handle that volume of business is a man out of the ordinary. And take the man who handles the division of agriculture, there are 7,000,000 farmers, and if you were to examine one of these schedules, the preparation of it, and the proper handling of this schedule and the business incident to it, you would see that the chief of that division is a man who must be almost on the same plane with the director himself. He is the man who does the work, as a matter of fact. And to restrict the operations of the bureau may possibly hamper the work in some way. Now, if you want the work to proceed in a businesslike, thorough-going manner, it seems to me the best thing to do is to let the bill remain as it is. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will be defeated.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seem to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 36.

So the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BARKLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. GALLINGER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

FOURTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT DECENNIAL CENSUSES.

The committee resumes its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That during the decennial census period the annual compensation of the officials of the Census Office shall be as follows: The Director of the Census, $7,500; the assistant director, $4,500; three chief statisticians and the chief clerk, $3,000 each; three other chief statisticians, $3,000, and the geographer, $2,750; the disbursing clerk, $3,000; the appointment clerk, $2,750; the chiefs of division, $2,250 each; the private secretary to the director, $2,250; the statistical experts, $2,000 each; and the stenographers provided for in section 3 of this act, $1,800 each.

Mr. ASWELL and Mr. GOOD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 23, after the word "clerk" strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,500"; and in line 23 strike out "three" and insert "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] desire to be heard?

Mr. ASWELL. If anyone wishes it, I shall offer just a word of explanation. You will notice that three statisticians, the first three referred to, are the present chiefs of divisions. They will have charge of the three great divisions during the census period; that is to say, they will have 2,000 employees each under them and be responsible for the handling of reports from 85,000 enumerators. They are the three gentlemen who have been in the service for many years. The other three statisticians, you will note, will be employed for the census period only. The bill provided for three of these. The committee discussed it very thoroughly and decided to cut out one of the three and make the number two, and give those three men who have charge of all the divisions $3,500, and thereby in actual dollars and cents there will be a saving of $1,500 a year. These second statisticians are really under the supervision of the first three, and the responsibility of the success of the whole census rests upon the first three gentlemen.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. What do these three trained experts receive now, and what did they receive under the former census?

Mr. ASWELL. Three thousand dollars in the last decennial census.

Mr. GOOD. And you are proposing now to increase their pay $500?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes; and cut out one of the others and reduce the sum total.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. You are increasing their pay from $3,000 to $3,500?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is that for just the period of the census?

Mr. ASWELL. For the three years only.

Mr. WALSH. It is not permanent?

Mr. ASWELL. It is not.

Mr. WALSH. And as to the two statisticians you are providing for, instead of three, what are they going to have charge of? How many employees will they have under them?

Mr. ASWELL. They, in a way, will be under the direction of these three.

Mr. WALSH. They will really be assistants to them?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he stated that these three experts during the time we were at work in collecting the data for the last census were receiving $3,000. Are they receiving $3,000 now?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes; during the census period.

Mr. GOOD. They received just the same?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. There is nothing in this bill that provides that after the work of taking this census is over their salaries will be reduced.

Mr. ASWELL. This census applies to only three years.

Mr. GOOD. So far as these experts are concerned we have always appropriated for them, in the years following the census, the same salaries that they formerly received.

Mr. ASWELL. No. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GOOD. My inquiry was whether, when they were at work before, collecting the data for the last census, they received $3,000, and the gentleman said they received that salary.

Mr. ASWELL. Yes; during the census period.

Mr. GOOD. So that they did not receive any more salary during the time they were collecting the data than they do at present?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. That is true, is it not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The chief statisticians at present get $3,000 a year, and under the Thirteenth Census they got $3,000 a year. This bill proposes to increase their pay $500 during the census period, but not as permanent law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption in that particular?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not understand that it is the purpose of the Census Committee to increase the salaries of the five chief statisticians who are now on the statutory roll from $3,000 each to $3,500, but it is the purpose of the committee to single out for preferment three chief statisticians who shall receive $3,500, thereby having five highly-expert chief statisticians receiving $3,000 on the statutory roll and another temporary force of three receiving $3,500.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No. The provisions of this bill and the salaries named in this bill apply only to the fourteenth decennial period.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, if the gentleman will permit, this bill does not seek to change the salaries of those on the statutory roll unless specific provision is made for them on the statutory roll. I find in the bill before me that the director shall receive $6,000, and five chief statisticians at $3,000 each. The bill provides for the appointment of three chief statisticians, and you propose to give them a salary of $3,500, $500 more than the Census Committee reported in the bill presented to the House for consideration.

Now, I present to the gentleman this practical situation: Here you have five chief statisticians on the statutory roll, expert men, receiving $3,000, and besides that you give three chief statisticians at $3,500 each, which will necessarily cause dissatisfaction, so far as the five permanent chief statisticians are concerned, if you are going to pay three, who are brought into the service and who will not equal those on the permanent roll in efficiency, $500 more during the three-year period for taking the census.

Mr. ASWELL. The three statisticians mentioned, who are to be increased to $3,500, are the three who are now in the office and are now the chief statisticians.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is mistaken. There are five now in the office.

Mr. ASWELL. I am speaking of the three at the head of the office.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They will have charge of the census—one of agriculture, one of manufactures, and the other of mines and quarries—and in view of the fact that they were to be in charge of this important work they felt that their salaries ought to be increased.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma). The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Louisiana be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. These gentlemen came before the committee and insisted that in view of the fact that they would be in charge of the work of these several divisions they ought to have the $500 additional pay, and instead of authorizing three other statistical experts we concluded, if that were true, that we would cut out one of them and add the $500 to their pay, which would result in a net saving so far as that was concerned of $500 and at the same time yield to their request, which we regarded as reasonable, to increase their pay during the census period $500 per year. That is all there is to it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I see this section provides for three chief statisticians and three other chief statisticians. That apparently makes six chief statisticians down there.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana cuts the three to two, as I understand.

Mr. WALSH. That is, instead of three others there are to be only two others?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And the three chief statisticians were each to get $3,500?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. We cut out one of the others.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The amendment cuts out one of the other three.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment. I know how enthusiastic Members of Congress become when sitting around a table, as the committee reporting out this bill sat around the table and heard the statement of the cost of these expert statisticians. I have been amazed, at hearings that I have attended for several years, to find the comparatively small salaries received by expert men in the employment of the Government. I have been surprised to learn of the small salaries that able lawyers in the employment of the Government receive. Since I have heard these statements for several years and have come in contact with many of these men, I have felt that we sometimes slop over, so to speak, when we talk about the underpaid clerks here in the departments at Washington. I know that the hearings before the committee on the legislative, executive, and judicial bill have disclosed the fact that men at the head of bureaus, experts, statisticians, and lawyers, hundreds of them, who are employed in all the different branches of the Government, are receiving very low salaries. I think many of them are underpaid, and that their salaries ought to be increased. I should be glad to engage in the work with the proper committee to revise the statutory salaries. But when the Subcommittee on Appropriations considered the legislative, executive, and judicial bill they found that in every department of the Government, including the Census Department, estimates were made for increases in the salaries of this very class of men. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] stood out and contested every one of these claims.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. The increases to which the gentleman refers did not apply to this case.

Mr. GOOD. They are the same character of men, even to the director himself. They are the same class of men in all the departments of the Government. I was about to say that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] had a job on his hands that lasted for 60 days, in declining all of these increases, and he did it on the theory that during this war there should be a substantial increase for those in the Government service who received salaries up to $2,000, but that we would not grant any increase to officials whose salaries were over $2,000. Now, in this amendment that the gentleman has offered, you are increasing the salary of the chief clerk $1,000. He now receives $2,500 a year, and you propose to increase his salary $1,000. He received only $2,500 during the last census.

Mr. ASWELL. I call attention to the fact that this bill is merely an authorization.

Mr. GOOD. So was the last census bill.

Mr. ASWELL. It refers it to the Committee on Appropriations to decide. It is not an order at all, but an authorization.

Mr. GOOD. In the hearings, on page 9, you have set out the last authorization bill, and that, as I understand it, carries $2,500 for the chief clerk.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I know the gentleman wants to be accurate in his statement.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; I do.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The chief clerk during the taking of the Thirteenth Census received $3,000. If the gentleman will turn to page 74 he will see the table there——

Mr. GOOD. I call the gentleman's attention to page 12 of the hearings, where I got my information. Section 5 reads as follows:

That during the decennial census period the annual compensation of the officials for the Census Office shall be as follows: Director of the Census, $7,000; Assistant Director, $5,000; three chief statisticians, at $3,000; chief clerk, $2,500.

It was estimated that he should receive $4,000. I am reading from the law. I can not tell about the gentleman's table, nor am I informed as to the amount subsequently appropriated. We are only concerned now with authorizations.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the explanation of it is this: That in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill the chief clerk's salary was increased during the decennial census period to $3,000. That was the explanation given to us, as I recall it.

Mr. GOOD. That may be true. The gentleman may be right.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. But the law that we enacted, the authorization, was for $2,500.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. And this is an increase of $1,000 over the authorization in the last law, according to this report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. I make these observations for this reason. In about three months we will have a new legislative bill to report. What does Congress want that committee to do in regard to salaries of this class of employees? Shall we increase the salaries of these very worthy men who now receive $3,000 to $3,500? Shall we reverse the policy of this Congress, where we declined to give these increases? We should be just and fair in our dealings with Government employees.

It was not long ago that I read somewhere in a platform of a political party about the salaries of these people that deplete the Treasury of the United States. I want to say to you now, without a tinge of politics, without any thought but interest of the Treasury and justice to the employees, that our decision should rest on a sound business proposition. We ought not now to increase the salaries of any of these men $500 a year, taking in view what the people are doing to put money into the Treasury of the United States. But if we increase the pay of one we should at the same time consider the claims of all employees of the same class.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If this amendment were not so vital to the salaries of all the highly paid officials of this Government I would not attempt to supplement the argument advanced by my colleague on the subcommittee of the legislative, judicial, and appropriation bill. As stated by him, our subcommittee was beset from the beginning of the hearings lasting two months with demands for increased salaries to these higher-paid officials, based upon the fact that their work had been increased by our entering the war. Our subcommittee, supported by the full committee and approved by this House, adopted the policy that we would not in this time of stress and strain, when we needed money so badly to carry on this great war, increase the salaries of these highly paid officials. In every instance we continued the salaries despite the urgent appeals of the heads of departments, despite the urgent appeal of the Secretary of State in person, despite the appeal of the Attorney General in person, and allowed the salaries of the higher-paid officials to stand as they were.

Now, what does the committee do as far as the chief clerk of the bureau, who is only receiving $2,500, is concerned? They propose to give him an increase of $1,000, or $3,500, on the plea that his work will be increased during the census period, and yet the chief clerk of the department, charged with greater responsibilities, tenfold over than this clerk, an able man, receives only $3,000. You are under the guise of exigency because he has a little different work, giving the chief clerk of the bureau $500 more, an increase of $1,000, and demoting, in fact, the chief clerk that has grave responsibilities in the department, allowing his salary to remain at $3,000.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. I am sure the gentleman does not want to insist on an error. We are not increasing the salary of this clerk $1,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. The chief clerk receives $2,500. I have it here in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman is correct in that, but I am not discussing what he is getting now, I am discussing the census period of 1910.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not made any statement as to the census period of 1910; my whole argument has been in harmony with the suggestion proposed to give this chief clerk a salary of $3,500. The chief clerk of the department, Mr. Johannes, a most capable and efficient man, is receiving only $3,000, and you are leaving his salary at $3,000. I submit to this House whether you should single out this clerk and show him the favoritism when at this time Congress by a set policy has said that the higher salaries should not be increased during this period of war.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I take it that everybody is in favor of saving money. That has been the cry, and yet when it gets down to the point of saving it we find that many who talk about it seem to be unwilling to do it. Gentlemen of the committee, if you are in favor of saving money, you are in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. The three clerks whose compensation it is intended to increase by this amendment are men who will be intrusted with the discharge of duties of a nature and responsibility which, I think, you will agree merits the increase of salary proposed in the amendment. One of these gentlemen will have 2,000 men working under him, another approximately 2,000, and the other at least 1,000.

The proposition is that in place of giving three statisticians $3,000 each, we cut out one of them, which will make two instead of three. In that way you will save $3,000 by disposing of the salary of one man. You can then add $500 to the salaries of each of the three chief statisticians, increasing their salaries to $3,500, and by that operation you save $1,500. If you are in favor of saving money, and at the same time favor paying efficient men what their services are worth, you have the chance to do so.

If you vote against the amendment, you vote to squander, as it were, $1,500 more, and if you vote in favor of the amendment, you vote to save $1,500, and at the same time provide adequate compensation for men who are in responsible positions.

Mr. GOOD. Then if we really want to save money we can demand a division of the amendment and vote down the first part and vote in the second part of the amendment.

Mr. LARSEN. I do not think you could do that, but perhaps you can.

Mr. GOOD. That is the way we could save money, and I hope we will do it. I demand a division of the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I understand this is a committee amendment, and I desire to compliment the committee and the distinguished members upon the unique policy and theory they have advanced here for saving money. They recommend that we have three chief statisticians and a chief clerk, and then three other chief statisticians. If there was no need for the three other chief statisticians, why did the committee recommend it, and if there is need of but two chief statisticians, why not eliminate one of the three recommended, and if you do eliminate one of them, why should we tack on a part of the salary of that one to the three others, who are already getting a salary which is commensurate with the duties they will be called upon to perform? Gentlemen talk about one of these three chief statisticians having one or two thousand men under his charge. Various other employees of the Government have that number under them.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. They not only have 2,000 men in the office force, but those three gentlemen are responsible for the work of 80,000 men in the field, in collecting and arranging facts as the facts are brought in.

Mr. WALSH. The responsibility will be principally of a directory nature, it will not increase their work one-tenth, and if it does, they have been appointed to these positions and they know what their duties are. They have been given sufficient funds to equip their office so that they can perform this work in an efficient manner, and it should not be a condition attached to their positions that when we happen to take the census they should have their compensations increased during the census period. I submit this is no way of saving money—to bring in a bill and call for three officials when only two are needed, and then lop off one of them and divide up part of his salary among three others whom they say they do need. I trust the amendment will be defeated and that when we come to consider the other chief statisticians we will reduce them to two. The member of the committee who has offered this amendment has admitted here that they need but two other chief statisticians. That being the case, I submit the committee ought to ask that that number be reduced, and we ought not to establish the precedent here, as it is sought to be established for other bills, of increasing these higher-paid officials of the Government. The exigency of this work is nothing compared with the importance of the work done by other officials of the Government in various other departments more intimately associated with the crisis in which this country now finds itself. We have not sought to increase the compensation of chief clerks or the statisticians or the experts in other lines of activity in the Government in any such amount as this.

Mr. ASWELL. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the Bureau of the Census the highest-paid man is receiving a salary only of $3,000, except the director.

Mr. WALSH. But you are increasing the salary in this measure.

Mr. ASWELL. Certainly; those three gentlemen will have added responsibilities.

Mr. WALSH. Now, if these gentlemen in the Bureau of the Census have only duties arduous enough to keep them employed $3,000 worth of their valuable time during periods between the census, I submit that we might reduce the force instead of keeping them on the pay roll.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman know that the Bureau of the Census has already lost most of its best men because of the higher salaries paid in other departments?

Mr. WALSH. Well, I understand we have a law which prevents them from being transferred to other departments.

Mr. ASWELL. But the fact is that the Bureau of the Census has lost probably all its best men, who either went into the lump-sum appropriation or else went out of the service altogether.

Mr. WALSH. That may be, Mr. Chairman, but the salaries we provide in this bill will bring an army of experts out of the wilds and woods that will more than fill the Census Bureau up three or four times, because they are going to have all sorts of experts, statisticians, theorists, economists, and a salary of $3,500 or $3,000 will look very alluring to those gentlemen who have been obliged to work at much less than that in the past.

Mr. ASWELL. I call attention to the fact that some of these men coming out of the woods come from Boston.

Mr. WALSH. Then it is high enough salaries for them, too, whether they come from Boston as experts or whether they come from New Orleans.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa demands a division of the amendment. The question will be taken on the first part of the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 23, after the word "clerk," strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,500."

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ASWELL) there were—ayes 10, noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the second part of the amendment.

Mr. KEARNS. Let us have that read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second part of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And, in line 23, strike out the word "three" and insert "two."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move, line 21, to strike out "$7,500" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "$7,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 21, strike out "$7,500" and insert "$7,000."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is the salary of $7,500, proposed in line 21, the salary which he is now receiving?

Mr. GOOD. He is now receiving $6,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This proposes an increase of $1,500?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; it proposes an increase of $1,500 over the present salary, and if I am correctly informed an increase of $500 over the salary that the last Director of the Census received.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Director of the Thirteenth Census got $7,000 and the Director of the Twelfth Census got $7,500.

Mr. GOOD. If the amendment which I have offered is adopted, the Director of the Census during the time required to take the census will receive the same salary that the last Director of the Census received during the time he was taking the census.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is right.

Mr. GOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit this is not the time to increase the salary of the Director of the Census so that he will receive $1,500 a year more than United States judges of district courts receive. Some of the very best men in the United States give their time and legal ability acquired after years of experience and training for $6,000 a year. Now it is proposed to pay the Director of the Census an increase of $500 a year over the amount paid when the last census was taken.

If we are to do this with regard to the Director of the Census, who is an able and a very agreeable man, why should we not increase the salaries of all officials of the Government and pay them increased salaries during this period of the war? We have just decided that these experts, these statisticians, must work at the same salaries that they received when the last census was taken. Let us not adopt a different policy so far as the Director of the Census is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That in addition to the force hereinbefore provided for and to that authorized by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial census period, there may be employed in the Census Office during the decennial census period, and no longer, as many clerks with salaries at the rates of $1,920, $1,800, $1,680, $1,560, $1,440, $1,380, $1,320, $1,260, $1,200, $1,140, $1,080, $1,020, $960, and $900; 1 engineer at $1,200 and 2 photostat operators at $1,200 each; as many skilled laborers, with salaries at the rate of not less than $720 nor more than $1,000 per annum; and as many messengers, assistant messengers, messenger boys, watchmen, unskilled laborers, and charwomen as may be found necessary for the proper and prompt performance of the duties herein required; these additional clerks and employees to be appointed by the Director of the Census: Provided, That the total number of such additional clerks with salaries at the rate of $1,440 or more per annum shall at no time exceed 150: Provided further, That employees engaged in the compilation or tabulation of statistics by the use of mechanical devices may be compensated on a piece-price basis to be fixed by the director.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee offers the following amendment: Page 4, line 9, after the word "clerks," strike out all down to and including the word "each" in line 13 and insert the words "of classes 4, 3, 2, and 1; and on line 21 strike out, after the word "clerks," down to and including the word "annum" in line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the words "of classes 2, 3, and 4."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say only a word in reference to this amendment. If this amendment is adopted it will restore the provision which was carried in the law of 1909, and I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will accept it. This section as drawn proposes for a portion of the Census Bureau employees a radical change in the system of classification which has prevailed in the various departments and bureaus here in Washington for the last 20 years, possibly. Under present classification, clerks are divided into classes of 1, 2, 3, and 4, paying salaries of $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800, respectively. This provision as written in this bill would change that classification, not as to the entire bureau, but simply as to those clerks who are employed during the decennial period of three years. In other words, we would have in the Census Bureau one class of clerks under the old classification and another set of clerks with the salary set forth in this provision, and it would necessarily create confusion in the drafting of the appropriation bill which will provide for the payment of these clerks.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This provision gave me much trouble, because I have never familiarized myself with the classification of clerks and their pay. But on page 13 of the hearings this committee appointed by the director makes this observation:

Under the scheme of classification provided by section 6 as amended, the clerical salaries, starting with $900, advance in increments of $60 up to $1,440 and thereafter by increments of $120 up to $1,920. This increase in the number of salary classes for clerks is considered desirable because it will make possible a more equitable adjustment of the salary to the varying degrees of merit and efficiency in the work of the clerks and will also permit more frequent promotions, thus tending to improve the morale and efficiency of the force. A small increase in salary carries with it a recognition of merit, the moral effect of which upon the clerk is hardly less than that of a considerably larger increase. The salary classification here advocated has already been adopted in some branches of the Government service and is substantially the same as that recommended several years ago by the committee on departmental methods commonly known as the Keep committee.

The gentleman is more familiar with that than I am.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say that the gentleman who made that statement is entirely in error, because there is not a department of this Government that has adopted this system of classification. The Director of the Census for the last two or three years has come before the subcommittee on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and made a proposition of this kind. I have said before on the floor of this House that I hope the time will come when Congress will take up the question of reclassifying the clerks and do it upon a scientific basis, and make it apply to all the departments and all the bureaus of the Government; and I hope that will be done as soon as this war is over. But I am opposed to undertaking to do that by piecemeal and making it apply to a portion of one bureau.

The gentleman who made the statement just read by the gentleman from Missouri is entirely in error, because, so far as I know, there is not a department in this Government which has not operated and is not operating under the old classification, which has existed for 20 years. And the only object I have in proposing this amendment is simply to prevent confusion in the drafting of the appropriation bills. And that, I think, was the controlling reason of the subcommittee which has reported the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bills here in declining the recommendation of the Director of the Census.

Now, this bill does not apply to the regular employees. The gentleman refers to the fact that this would afford a more ready means and a more equitable means of promotion. As a matter of fact, it would bring about confusion and discrimination in the bureau, for at the same desk possibly there would be clerks who would be serving under the present classification of 1, 2, 3, and 4, and to which I have referred. It ought to apply to all the clerks or none. Therefore I think, gentlemen, that in the interest of order and to the end that the Congress may know what it is doing when your appropriation bill comes in here next December this amendment ought to be adopted. If it is adopted, it will restore the provision which was carried in the bill of 1909.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to be in any way at cross-purposes with the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, and I think that my position is thoroughly understood by those who are associated with me on that committee. I endeavored to impress my views on the committee in drafting the bill. I think I am not transgressing any rule of propriety by saying that I was opposed to all increases in salaries in the drafting of this bill.

I believe that what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has said is correct, in that this departure from the usual method of classification and compensation to clerical employees will create confusion. We undertook to bring out that feature of the situation at the hearing, and we were assured, as I recall it—and I think my recollection is clear—that it would not disconcert the appropriations as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, but on the contrary that several of the departments or bureaus, or subdivisions of some of the departments, had adopted this method. For my part, I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee will carry. I have on several occasions addressed the House in opposition to proposed increases of salaries during the war in other bills, and have voted against all such proposals; for the same reasons I shall oppose the proposed increases in this bill. No Member of the House could justify a vote increasing his own salary during the continuance of the war; for the same reason I do not believe he is justified in voting to increase the salary of any civilian employee of the Government, except in the rarest instances.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the lady from Montana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Miss RANKIN: Page 5, line 2, after the word "director," insert:

"Provided, That, whenever possible, women and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors shall be employed in the positions herein provided for."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the amendment offered by the lady from Montana was adopted to the prior section it was stated that it was after the word "rules," in line 25, on page 2. I believe it should have been offered to follow the amendment just adopted, offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN]. The gentleman from Michigan offered an amendment not to exempt any of these persons from military duty, and then the lady from Montana offered her amendment. The way it was offered the amendment read to follow the word "rules," on line 25.

Mr. HELM. Anything to oblige the lady from Montana.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the lady from Montana should follow the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan that was adopted, instead of following the word "rules," in line 25, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has already been inserted in that way. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the additional clerks and other employees provided for by section 6 shall be subject to such special test examinations as the Director of the Census may prescribe the said examinations to be conducted by the United States Civil Service Commission, to be open to all applicants without regard to political party affiliations, and to be held at such places in each State as may be designated by the Civil Service Commission. Certifications shall be made by the Civil Service Commission upon request of the Director of the Census from the eligible registers so established, in conformity with the law of apportionment as now provided for the classified service, in the order of rating: Provided, That the requirement as to conformity with the law of apportionment shall not apply to messenger boys, unskilled laborers, and charwomen: Provided further, That hereafter all examinations of applicants for positions in the Census Office from any State or Territory, shall be had in the State or Territory in which such applicant resides, and no person shall be eligible for such examination or appointment unless he or she shall have been actually domiciled in such State or Territory for at least one year previous to such examination: Provided further, That the Civil Service Commission may hold examinations for positions in such service of applicants temporarily absent from the place of their legal residence or domicile in the District of Columbia and elsewhere in the United States where examinations are usually held upon proof satisfactory to the commission that such applicant is a bona fide resident of the State or Territory in which such applicant claims to have a legal residence or domicile: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to abridge the existing law or apportionment or change the requirements of existing law as to legal residence or domicile of such applicants: And provided further, That no person afflicted with tuberculosis shall be appointed and that each applicant for appointment shall accompany his or her application with a certificate of health from some reputable physician: And provided further, That in no instance shall more than one person be appointed from the same family: And provided further, That when the exigencies of the service require, the director may appoint for temporary employment not exceeding six months' duration from the aforesaid list of eligibles those who, by reason of residence or other conditions, are immediately available, and may also appoint for not exceeding six months' duration persons having had previous experience in operating mechanical appliances in census work whose efficiency records in operating such appliances are satisfactory to him, and may accept such records in lieu of the civil-service examination: And provided further, That employees in other branches of the departmental classified service who have had previous experience in census work may be transferred without examination to the Census Office to serve during the whole or a part of the decennial census period, and at the end of such service the employees so transferred shall be eligible to appointment to positions in any department held by them at date of transfer to the Census Office without examination: And provided further, That during the decennial census period, and no longer, the Director of the Census may fill vacancies in the permanent force of the Census Office by the promotion or transfer of clerks or other employees employed on the temporary force authorized by section 6 of this act: And provided further, That at the expiration of the decennial census period the term of service of all employees so transferred and of all other temporary officers and employees appointed under the provisions of this act shall terminate, and such officers and employees shall not be eligible to appointment or transfer into the classified service of the Government by virtue of their examination or appointment under this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first proviso at the top of page 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 7, line 1, strike out the proviso beginning on line 1 and ending on line 9, which reads as follows:

"And provided further, That employees in other branches of the departmental classified service who have had previous experience in census work may be transferred without examination to the Census Office to serve during the whole or a part of the decennial census period, and at the end of such service the employees so transferred shall be eligible to appointment to positions in any department held by them at date of transfer to the Census Office without examination."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in moving to strike out that proviso is to put a stop to the very objectionable practice that has been indulged in by these new bureaus that have been established in competing with the various established departments in trying to secure their best employees at higher wages or salaries. The one major complaint that we have found in considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill has been that these new bureaus—the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, the Bureau of Food Administration, and the Bureau of Fuel Administration—have gone into the old departmental service and have offered to the clerks additional salaries, so that they would leave their former employment, causing disorganization in the permanent force of the old departmental service.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Is it not a fact that recent legislation has corrected that, and that whole matter is stopped? They can not be transferred at an increase of salary at all now.

Mr. STAFFORD. That practice was called to the attention of the President, because it became critical to the welfare of the public service.

Mr. ASWELL. It has been stopped.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been stopped; but here you are permitting that very character of employment.

Mr. ASWELL. Not at increased salaries. The existing law prohibits increased salaries.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, under the Executive order, to correct that situation, the prohibition was made not only against the transfer at increased salaries but there was an absolute prohibition denying the right of any new bureau or department to secure the services of a clerk in the other departments without the full approval of the head of the bureau or department where the clerk was employed.

Mr. ASWELL. It does not have anything to do with that order.

Mr. STAFFORD. This authorizes the Census Office to go into any department of the Government and offer the employees higher salaries.

Mr. ASWELL. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is there anything that prevents it? Where is there anything in this bill that prevents the head of the Census Office going into other departments and claiming the transfer of other clerks at higher salaries?

Mr. ASWELL. It is impossible under existing Executive order.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not possible under existing Executive order. The existing Executive order forbids the transfer of any clerk from one department to another new bureau or establishment. Now, here, by legislation——

Mr. ASWELL. It is forbidden by existing law now.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not hear the gentleman when I am talking myself.

Mr. ASWELL. I say it is forbidden by existing law now.

Mr. STAFFORD Now, by this provision you are authorizing that very thing which the President found it was necessary to stop by Executive order.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HELM. Much of the criticism that the gentleman refers to is absolutely correct. That is to say, some of the war bureaus have practiced some very gross improprieties in taking clerks from other departments by offering them higher salaries. No bureau in the Government has suffered more from that practice than the Census Bureau. Twenty or thirty of the best men in the Census Bureau have been drafted by these war bureaus in order really to show them how to perform the work that they were appointed to do. Now, so far as the gentleman's criticism was directed against that, he is correct; but this provision is to permit those who have heretofore been connected with the Census Bureau and are not otherwise employed——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no—otherwise employed.

Mr. HELM. Any man who knows the temperament of the departmental clerk as well as the gentleman from Wisconsin knows that a man who is in another department is not going into the Census Department at less compensation.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; at more compansation.

Mr. HELM. How is he going to get it? You have restored classes 4, 3, 2, and 1.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; there is nothing that prevents the Director of the Bureau of the Census——

Mr. HELM. These are clerical positions, and these men will come from class 1 in the Treasury Department into class 1 in the Census Bureau; they will come out of class 2 in any other department into class 2 in the Census Bureau; they will come out of class 3 in some other department and go into class 3 in the Census Bureau. There is nothing here to justify the criticism of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the bill that provides that these clerks who are now employed in one department shall be transferred to the other in the same class. If there were any such provision, there would not be the incentive for a person in one department to seek a transfer to the Census Bureau, where he has had prior experience in that line. The very purpose is that he may get back into the Census Bureau at an increased compensation, disorganizing the departmental service, of which I have complained, and the gentleman says my complaint is a just one. That is the one thing which I wish to warn against. We do not want to let the Census Bureau compete with other departments which have certain employees formerly employed in the Census Bureau.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Would the trouble that the gentleman from Wisconsin points out be remedied by an amendment like this—that no employee so transferred shall receive a higher salary than he is now receiving?

Mr. ASWELL. They can not, for a year afterwards, now.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Did the gentleman from Missouri rise to answer my question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor. I understand the abuse sought to be stopped by Executive order was by transfer to other parts of the service where provision was made by lump-sum appropriation to pay the clerks. Could that abuse exist under this proviso? If they come into the employ of the Bureau of the Census, they would not come in under the lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes. I do not pretend to know the bill better than the gentlemen who have reported it, but all of these employees for the period of the census will be provided for by lump-sum appropriations, and, under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, they will have to be in class 1, class 2, class 3, or class 4, and there will be nothing to prevent a clerk in the Navy Department, receiving $1,400, from going to the Bureau of Census and receiving $1,600 after his transfer to the Bureau of Census. The vice that appealed to the Executive and caused him to put a bar to that practice is being lowered by the proviso.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This was in a section of the bill of 1910.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the conditions then were not so pressing as they are to-day. One department should not be allowed to take the clerks of another department by offering them an increase of pay of $200, $400, and sometimes as high as $600, to be paid out of a lump-sum appropriation, as has been indulged in by some of these new bureaus. This proviso would lift that bar and enable that practice, so far as the Census Bureau is concerned, to be continued.

Mr. GILLETT. Would not that also be disrespectful to the President, for is it not repealing his Executive order as applied to the bureau?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about that, but I would not charge the Democratic Party with being disrespectful to the President.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is in the existing law and we did not disturb it. Would not the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Michigan cure that?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; it would not. It would not prevent them at any time increasing the salary to a higher grade.

Mr. ASWELL. The existing law provides that clerks can not be transferred and the salary increased within 12 months thereafter.

Mr. STAFFORD. But this law supersedes that, and you ought not to be allowed to disorganize one department by another.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a violent disagreement as to the interpretation of this section. I think if it is going to be correctly interpreted we should have a larger attendance, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HELM. Will not the gentleman withhold it until we dispose of the amendment to this section?

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold the point temporarily, to see if we can not get the situation smoothed out.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 9, after the word "nation," add the following words: "but no employee so transferred shall within one year after such transfer receive a higher salary than he is receiving at the time of the transfer."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing two pages of a statement of the Federal reserve bank of the fifth district relative to cotton loans.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee presented a conference report on the bill H. R. 10358, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for printing under the rule.

AEROPLANES.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in reference to the production of aeroplanes.

Mr. FOSTER. Will it consist of the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. CRAMTON. In part, but it will include also a statement which I think will be of general interest to the House.

Mr. FOSTER. By a Government official or by an outsider?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say that there is no official objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 26, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. FIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 401) requesting the Board of Managers of National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to report to the House of Representatives conditions at the soldiers' home in Virginia and reasons for separation of Joseph S. Smith from the governorship, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 691), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 392) requesting information as to the number of men in the service of the Food Administrator and Fuel Administrator who are within the draft age, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 692), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL OF RAILROADS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Acting Director General of Railroads in response to a resolution (S. Res. 258) of the Senate of the 6th instant, which will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The communication is as follows:

DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS,
Washington, June 21, 1918.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of June 6, 1918, I beg to reply as follows:

(1) No action has been taken in regard to taking over as part of the Railroad Administration any of the stockyards of the country.

As to the stockyards railways, the present view of the Railroad Administration is that in general it will be in the public interest for the Government not to exercise control of such railways, since they are either wholly or largely plant facilities for the stockyards service. The allowances made to such stockyards railways will, however, be carefully scrutinized to see that they are not excessive. It is believed that an adequate and nondiscriminatory service can be secured without Federal control of these railways.

In a few cases the stockyards railways may be so extensive and may serve so many industries, other than the stockyards and packing houses, as to make such railways an integral part of the general terminal facilities of the United States Railroad Administration and necessitate their retention in Federal control. The Chicago Junction Railway, which has 220 miles of track and serves many other industries, is of this class.

These questions at present are receiving careful study, and a specific answer as to the permanent status of these stockyards railways in respect of Federal control can not be made until the study shall be completed.

(2) It is believed that the Director General of Railroads has not authority under existing laws to take over stockyards. The authority under which the roads were taken over by the President is derived from the act approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," and the power is limited to systems of transportation or parts thereof. The Federal control act approved March 21, 1918, does not, it is believed, enlarge this power.

(3) No study, as such, has been made regarding the ownership and control of the stockyards to determine what, if any, connection such ownership and control has upon the packing industries of the country. The only information which we have sought is to determine whether the terminal roads in different localities should be taken under control of the Government.

Cordially, yours, WALKER D. HINES,
Acting Director General.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 3798) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

A bill (S. 4193) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

A bill (S. 4542) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9506) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9641) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10924) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11658) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the Woman's Club of Eastport, Me., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of sundry citizens of Wyoming, favoring the enactment of further prohibition legislation as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Twin Butte Grange, No. 38, Patrons of Husbandry, of Bordeaux, Wyo., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LODGE presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry citizens of Mattapoisett, Mass., praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Clearing House Association of New Bedford, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to guarantee certain bank deposits, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I present a memorial in the nature of a plea from a number of women war workers in the State of New York, protesting against the passage of the woman-suffrage amendment.

I also present a memorial containing over 3,000 names, which is addressed to the Senate, from sundry citizens of the State of New York, protesting against the passage of the same amendment. I ask that the memorials be noted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorials will lie on the table.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented memorials of sundry citizens of Rochester, Riverdale, Plattsburg, Troy, Garden City, Brooklyn, New York City, and Bronxville, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. HOLLIS on the 24th instant proposing to appropriate $1,200 to pay Dennis M. Kerr for extra and expert service rendered to the Committee on Pensions, etc., reported it favorably without amendment and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. From the Committee on Interstate Commerce I report back favorably, with an amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 159) to extend the time within which the President may relinquish control of any railroad or system of transportation, as provided in section 14 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, to January 1, 1919.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 4754) granting an increase of pension to John Bush; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 4755) granting an increase of pension to Martha R. Griswold (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 4756) granting an increase of pension to James D. Wilder (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota:

A bill (S. 4757) granting an increase of pension to Lewis Newman (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 4758) granting a pension to Joshua S. Sneed; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 161) authorizing the Secretary of War to cause a preliminary examination and survey to be made of Coney Island Creek, N. Y.; to the Committee on Commerce.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. TILLMAN. I submit the report of the committee of conference on House bill 10854, the naval appropriation bill, and I give notice that I shall call it up at some time later in the day. I ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10854) "making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5 and 53.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 34, 35, 38, 39, 41, 42, 102, and 115, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of said amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That the act approved August 29, 1916, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes' (Stat. L., vol. 39, ch. 417, pp. 573, 574), be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of said act following the caption 'Naval Dental Corps,' on page 573, but preceding the caption 'Dental Reserve Corps,' on page 574, and by substituting therefor the following:

"'That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint and commission, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dental officers in the Navy at the rate of one for each thousand of the total authorized number of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, in the grades of assistant dental surgeon, passed assistant dental surgeon, and dental surgeon, who shall constitute the Naval Dental Corps, and shall be a part of the Medical Department of the Navy. Original appointments to the Naval Dental Corps shall be made in the grade of assistant dental surgeon with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade), and all dental officers now in the Dental Corps appointed under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 22, 1912 (Stat. L. 37, p. 345), or under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916 (Stat. L. 39, p. 573), or who may hereafter be appointed, shall take rank and precedence with officers of the Naval Medical Corps of the same rank according to the dates of their respective commissions or original appointments, and all such dental officers shall be eligible for advancement in grade and rank in the same manner and under the same conditions as officers of the Naval Medical Corps with or next after whom they take precedence, and shall receive the same pay and allowances as officers of corresponding rank and length of service in the Naval Medical Corps up to and including the rank of lieutenant commander: Provided, That dental surgeons shall be eligible for advancement in pay and allowances, but not in rank, to and including the pay and allowances of commander and captain, subject to such examinations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, except that the number of dental surgeons with the pay and allowances of captain shall not exceed 4½ per cent and the number of dental surgeons with the pay and allowances of commander shall not exceed 8 per cent of the total authorized number of dental officers: Provided further, That dental surgeons shall be eligible for advancement to the pay and allowances of commander and captain when their total active service as dental officers in the Navy is such that if rendered as officers of the Naval Medical Corps it would place them in the list of medical officers with the pay and allowances of commander or captain, as the case may be: And provided further, That dental officers who shall have gained or lost numbers on the Navy list shall be considered to have gained or lost service accordingly; and the time served by dental officers on active duty as acting assistant dental surgeons and assistant dental surgeons under provisions of law existing prior to the passage of this act shall be reckoned in computing the increased service pay and service for precedence and promotion of dental officers herein authorized or heretofore appointed.'

"All appointees authorized by this act shall be citizens of the United States between 21 and 32 years of age, and shall be graduates of standard medical or dental colleges and trained in the several branches of dentistry, and shall, before appointment, have successfully passed mental, moral, physical and professional examinations before medical and professional examining boards appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and have been recommended for appointment by such boards: Provided, That hereafter no person shall be appointed as assistant dental surgeon in the Navy who is not a graduate of a standard medical or dental college.

"Officers of the Naval Dental Corps shall become eligible for retirement in the same manner and under the same conditions as now prescribed by law for officers of the Naval Medical Corps, except that section 1445 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be applicable to dental officers, and they shall not be entitled to rank above lieutenant commander on the retired list, or to retired pay above that of captain.

"All dental officers now serving under probationary appointments shall become immediately eligible for permanent appointment under the provisions of this act, subject to the examinations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy for original appointment as dental officers, and may be appointed assistant dental surgeon with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) to rank from the date of their probationary appointments: Provided, That the senior dental officer now at the United States Naval Academy shall not be displaced by the provisions of this act, and he shall hereafter have the grade of dental surgeon and the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant commander, and he shall not be eligible for retirement before he has reached the age of 70 years, except for physical disability incurred in the line of duty: Provided further, That no dental officer in the Navy who on original appointment as dental officer was over 40 years of age shall be eligible for retirement before he has reached the age of 70 years, except for physical disability incurred in line of duty.

"All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act relating to the Dental Corps of the Navy are hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to legislate out of the service any officer now in the Medical Department of the Navy or to reduce the rank, pay, or allowances now authorized by law for any officer of the Navy."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 93, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$2,500,000" and insert "$1,000,000" and add the following proviso: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for this purpose not to exceed $1,500,000 in addition to the appropriations herein made." Strike out "$2,525,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$1,025,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 100, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 6 of said amendment, after the word "condemnation" insert the words "or acquisition." Strike out "$550,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$850,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 112, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$49,999,375" and in lieu thereof insert "$46,694,375"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 120, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized during the period of the present war to promote temporarily, with the advice and consent of the Senate, commissioned line officers and engineer officers of the United States Coast Guard below the rank and grades of captain and captain of engineers to the ranks and grades of the Coast Guard not above captain and captain of engineers, respectively, without regard to number or length of service in rank or grade: Provided, That such temporary promotions may be to such rank and grade in the Coast Guard not above captain or captain of engineers as correspond to the rank and grade that may be attained in accordance with law, either permanently or temporarily, by line officers of the Regular Navy of the same length of total service: Provided further, That constructors of the Coast Guard now authorized by law who shall have had as much total service in the Coast Guard as the officer of the Construction Corps of the Navy at the foot of the permanent or temporary list of those with the rank of lieutenant commanders may be temporarily promoted to the rank of captain of the Coast Guard: And provided further, That for the purposes of this act service in the Coast Guard to be counted must have been continuous: And provided further, That nothing contained in this paragraph shall operate to disturb the relative position of officers in the Coast Guard with reference to precedence or promotion, but all such officers otherwise qualified shall be advanced in rank with or ahead of officers in the Coast Guard who were their juniors on the date of this act.

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized during the period of the present war to promote temporarily, with the advice and consent of the Senate the captain commandant of the Coast Guard to the rank of commodore in the Navy and brigadier general in the Army, and the engineer in chief of the Coast Guard to the rank of captain in the Navy and colonel in the Army, officers of the Coast Guard holding permanent commissions above the rank and grade of first lieutenant and first lieutenant of engineers as follows: Not to exceed two-fifths of the captains authorized by law, and not to exceed one-third of the captains of engineers authorized by law, to have the rank of senior captain in the Coast Guard; and not to exceed one-third the senior captains authorized by law to have the rank of captain in the Navy and colonel in the Army: Provided, That the senior captains, captains, and captains of engineers to be temporarily promoted as herein provided shall be selected as provided by law for promotion by selection in the Navy.

"That during the period of the present war, the senior district superintendent, the three district superintendents next in order of seniority, the four district superintendents next below these three in order of seniority, and the junior five district superintendents shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of captain, first lieutenant, second lieutenant, and third lieutenant in the Coast Guard, respectively.

"That the permanent and probationary commissions of officers of the Coast Guard shall not be vacated by reason of the temporary promotions and advancements authorized by this act, nor shall said officers be prejudiced in their relative lineal rank in regard to their promotion as provided for in existing law: Provided, That no officer who shall receive a temporary promotion or advancement under this act shall be entitled to pay or allowances except under such promotion or advancement: Provided further, That upon the termination of the temporary promotions and advancements authorized by this act, the officers so promoted and advanced shall revert to the rank and grade from which temporarily promoted or advanced, unless such officers in the meantime, in accordance with law, become entitled to promotion to a higher grade or rank in the permanent Coast Guard, in which case they shall revert to said higher grade or rank, and shall, after passing the prescribed examinations, be commissioned accordingly.

"That all temporary promotions and advancements authorized by this act shall continue in force only until otherwise directed by the President, and not later than six months after the termination of the present war.

"That any officer of the Coast Guard temporarily promoted or advanced in grade or rank in accordance with the provisions of this act who shall be retired from active service under his permanent commission while holding such temporary grade or rank, except for physical disability incurred in line of duty, shall be placed on the retired list with the grade or rank to which his position in the permanent Coast Guard at the date of his retirement would entitle him.

"That officers of the United States Coast Guard on sea duty or on shore duty beyond the continental limits of the United States during the period of the present war shall receive the same increase of pay and allowances in all respects as are now or may hereafter be provided by law for officers of the Navy of corresponding rank.

"That nothing contained in this act relating to the Coast Guard shall operate to reduce the rank, pay, or allowances that would have been received by any person in the Coast Guard except for the passage of this act."

And the Senate agrees to the same.

On amendments of the Senate numbered 37, 47, 52, and 170 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the Senator in charge of the Army appropriation bill has agreed to yield to me for just a moment.

I desire to ask the conferees on the part of the Senate upon the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 9054) what the possibilities are for an agreement on that bill? This matter has been before the conference committee for a long time. The time is near at hand, I think, when Senators generally expect a recess. It is important to facilitate the necessary business of the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, answering the Senator's question, I will say that the House and Senate conferees have had several conferences on the Agricultural appropriation bill. It is known to the Senate that an agreement was reached some time since on all the amendments except the amendment numbered 44, increasing the guaranteed price of wheat to $2.50 a bushel. Everything else except that is agreed to, and there is only that difference now in conference.

We held a conference day before yesterday. It was a protracted session. A number of modifications were submitted by the Senate conferees signifying their willingness to agree to the several modifications. The House conferees declined to accept any modifications whatever, and insisted on a recession on the part of the Senate. A majority of the Senate conferees were not willing to recede.

Of course, we shall abide by any instruction the Senate may see fit to direct to the conferees, but we are unwilling to recede voluntarily, since the amendment was adopted under a suspension of the rules. A two-thirds majority of the Senate voted to suspend the rules and adopted this particular amendment by a vote of 49 to 18. In that situation the Senate conferees feel bound by the express sense of the Senate, and they feel that the Senate, and not the conferees, ought to take the initial step looking to a recession, if any is to be taken.

We hope, if the Senate conferees and the Senate will insist on the amendment, that sooner or later the House conferees will recede, but I can not say to the Senator making the inquiry that I see any prospect of recession on the part of the House conferees.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, this is one of the big supply bills, and the 1st of July is right at hand when these moneys will be needed. It seems to me the time has arrived when this matter should be disposed of, and unless there is some satisfactory report from the conferees to-morrow morning I shall feel it to be my duty to move that the Senate conferees be instructed to recede on the amendment which is in disagreement. I shall make the motion to-morrow morning unless some satisfactory report from the committee is made.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senate proceed with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, but before proceeding with the amendment which was pending at the time the Senate took a recess I desire to make a statement for the information of the Senate. If I do not state the matter correctly, I hope what I may say will be supplemented by some other member of the Military Affairs Committee who was present.

At the suggestion or possibly at the request of some of the members of the Military Affairs Committee made to me yesterday, I invited to be present at the meeting of the Military Affairs Committee this morning the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, with Gen. March, Chief of Staff, and Gen. Crowder, the Judge Advocate General and Provost Marshal General, to discuss with the committee the proposition of changing the age limit of the draft, either by lowering it to 18 or 20 or to any age, or by increasing it from 30 to 40 or any age above the present draft limit. We met this morning at 9.30 o'clock, and the committee has been in session discussing the matter with these gentlemen until the convening of the Senate.

Both the Secretary of War and Gen. March are of the opinion that no change ought to be made in the age limit of the draft at this time. They say in order to have proper consideration as to what the limit should be a complete investigation ought to be made as to the number of men within the draft age now, the number of men who can be transported to France, the shipping necessary to take them over, and the amount of supplies that will be necessary to equip and keep the men who are taken there; that such an examination is now being made; and that no harm can be done and no delay occasioned by the postponement of the consideration of the changing the age of the draft until September, when probably there will be a reconvening of the Senate or the Senate may be in session that long. They very much advised against the change until this examination and investigation can be had.

The committee was given to understand that the troops which are being sent over now are being sent over in bottoms that are furnished in part by France, leased by America, of course, and bottoms that are furnished by Great Britain. There may be some changes in these arrangements for the transportation of troops by the end of July. At that time new arrangements may be made, or there may be sufficient American shipping to transport them; but in any event they feel that before any change is made and any disturbance in the social or industrial life of the country a full investigation ought to be made, and then action taken by the committee upon the enlarged program that it is deemed to be necessary to be proposed to Congress by the Secretary of War and the War Department.

In view of this discussion the committee concluded by a majority vote that it probably would be best not to undertake to change the age limit of the draft at this time. I say this because I want the Senate to be thoroughly advised about it, and in possible explanation of the vote which I may feel impelled to cast in view of the statements of these distinguished officers.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator stated that the Secretary of War and Gen. March were in favor of no increase or decrease in the age limit, but the Senator did not state what Gen. Crowder's opinion was.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Each of these gentlemen stated positively that he thought no change ought to be made at this juncture until an investigation could be had. Each was asked individually what his opinion was, and when Gen. Crowder was appealed to Gen. Crowder simply said that it was his duty to search out and to carry out what was agreed upon. I think we can read between the lines of the statements which Gen. Crowder has made from time to time that he entertains the same opinion that I do, and the same opinion that other Members of the Senate entertain, and that is that eventually these changes will have to be made. The only question with us at present is whether it is necessary to make them now or whether they could better be made two months from now, and they say no delays will be occasioned.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he would enlighten us as to what source of information is available to the Secretary of War which is not also available to the Committee on Military Affairs, and why the committee can not obtain all information upon which it could pass its judgment, and if it is the duty of the committee to prepare for war, why the judgment of that committee should not govern rather than the judgment of the officers themselves?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will answer the Senator by saying that this proposition of changing the draft age was not suggested to the committee by the War Department and was not initiated by the committee, and therefore the subject was not gone into and investigated before the Army appropriation bill was reported. It was offered and initiated, as the Senator knows, by a proposed amendment in the Senate. It was taken up and discussed here.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In just a moment. Therefore the committee has not had an opportunity to investigate the whole subject with reference to our arrangements with our allies. We only had this morning to devote to the consideration of the matter, particularly with reference to the shipping proposition.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I simply wish to suggest to the Senator from Oregon that, to my mind, no one can be better informed in regard to the situation and in regard to the needs than Gen. Crowder himself, and I am satisfied that Gen. Crowder approves of this proposed legislation. It was from Gen. Crowder yesterday morning about 10 o'clock that I first learned of the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, and it was my clear understanding that he favored the amendment. He talked about it with the Senator from New Mexico, and the amendment had his entire approval. Since in raising the armies we need it is his business to answer the requisitions of the Chief of Staff and Gen. Pershing, it would seem to me we could rely more upon what he has to say in regard to it than upon other authorities.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me, I had always supposed that it was the function of Congress to raise armies. I had supposed it was one of the provisions of the Constitution which imposed that duty upon Congress. Therefore I assumed that it was the function of the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into these subjects and to use its judgment on the age for the draft and not the judgment of anyone else, because upon that judgment must depend the size of the Army which Congress is to raise.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there is not any question about the position which the Senator from North Dakota takes; but the Senator knows, as every other Senator does, that, in seeking information as to the size of the Army, as to the needs of the Army, and as to other matters involved in this war, such information is sought from the Commander in Chief, or, if not directly from him, through those who represent him. As I have stated to the Senator, we have not had an opportunity to go into this at very great length, because it was initiated for the first time on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I supposed that the amendment was offered while the matter was still before the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It might be introduced as a separate measure, if need be, and considered at length, and would have been considered more at length if it had been raised before the committee, and if there had not been such haste to get through the military appropriation bill, the passage of which is absolutely necessary for the support of the Army.

I want to say to the Senator that that bill did not come over to the Senate until very recently; so the committee has spent most of its time in considering the items of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, being one of those who believe that we ought to raise the largest possible army we can raise, and that we ought to put it in the field in France in the shortest possible time, I think the Committee on Military Affairs ought to investigate, and, upon the result of that investigation, ought to use its own judgment as to the size of the Army that is to be used. What I rather object to, however, is not that the committee may fail at any time to perform its functions as a war committee but that it seems inclined to follow entirely, without using any judgment whatever, any suggestion which may come from the Secretary of War or from the War Department. I do not think that is just to Congress.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I hardly think that is a fair conclusion to draw from the statement I made or from any statement I shall hereafter make; but I think the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, who are in direct touch with the situation, are in a position to know all about the allocation of ships, the arrangements that we have with Great Britain and France about troop ships, and the shipping program generally of the United States with reference to the carrying of cargo to maintain such troops.

Mr. McCUMBER. Are we not entitled to that information at all times, and ought we not to exercise our judgment upon it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no doubt about that, Mr. President; and there is no doubt that the committee was exercising its judgment when it reached the conclusion it did, and which I have stated.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a question? I want to get some information which I did not exactly catch.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. FALL. It seems to me the most significant part of the Senator's statement has not impressed itself, possibly, upon the Senate as it has upon myself. I agree thoroughly that the committee should seek the advice of the War Department; and, so far as I am concerned, under ordinary circumstances I would by my action not only seek it but I am frank to say that, unless I was convinced that that advice was incorrect, I should be inclined to follow it; but I understand the Senator from Oregon to say that the War Department asked that nothing be done, because they are now investigating the question and have not determined whether or not more troops will be needed first and whether, if they are needed, they can be used because of shipping, supplies, and so forth.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They were investigating more particularly, I will say to the Senator from New Mexico, the question of our ability to get the men over if we increased the number of men who are to be transported, and then the question of our ability to feed them with the shipping facilities we have if we had them over there.

Mr. FALL. And they could not now give the committee that information?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They could not now give the committee that information.

Mr. FALL. After 14 months' time they do not know whether we need any more men, whether we are going to need any more men, whether we have supplies to furnish them, and whether we shall be able to use them or get them across the water, and they need additional time to offer that information to the committee?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from New Mexico knows that the transportation of troops to France has been very much speeded up in the last two or three months.

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They have been able to do that because of the fact that they have leased ships from Great Britain and have leased ships from France. It is the information of these gentlemen, or it is stated by them, that by the end of July our arrangements for the troop ships that we are renting from those Governments will end. Some arrangement has got to be made with reference to that, and they are negotiating about that now. It is barely possible, though not probable, that our own shipping facilities may be sufficient to handle this situation at that time, but they say certainly our own shipping facilities will be sufficient by the 1st of January to handle the whole proposition.

Mr. FALL. Then they ask that we do not act. If our shipping facilities are going to be sufficient, and we would still have at our command the shipping facilities which we are now using of France and Great Britain, which would greatly enlarge the total shipping facilities, then they must be hesitating because they do not know whether we are going to need additional forces or not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They claim that we are raising all the men that we can handle either in the way of training or in the way of transportation, and that there will be no danger of infringing upon class 2 of the draft act before we have an opportunity to act and to provide for any larger program that Congress may determine upon.

Mr. FALL. Then, Mr. President, they do not care at this time to have any measure of preparedness adopted, although the use of the means would not be at all compulsory, but simply that the President, as Commander in Chief, if his advisers thought best later, would have the instrument placed in his hands by the Congress of the United States by the passage of this bill. They oppose it, although there is no compulsion about it and although it does not require another ship or another pound of food. I will admit that I am in somewhat of a quandary to understand just the idea, but I understand from portions of the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] on yesterday that it seems to be the impression in the minds of some people, and apparently in the minds of the War Department officials, that it will require more tonnage, more shipping, more guns, more rifles and bigger rifles, and more ammunition to supply in Europe a single man of 20 who has no dependent family than it would to supply a man of 30 who has a wife and five children. That could be the only objection to this, because there is no proposition to compel anyone to put another man in the Army.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to say to the Senator that he knows my personal view upon this whole subject.

Mr. FALL. I know the Senator's view.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to say to the Senator that, if I had it in my power, I would change the age limit to include those from 18 to 45, and I would have 2,500,000 men in France with all the speed possible to get them there, and as many more in training here at this time.

I may say further to the Senator that I am not disposed personally to agree with the views of the Secretary of War upon the subject of changing the draft age, but I want to express to the Senate the views that he has expressed to the committee and the conclusion which the majority of the committee came to after having heard the statements of these gentlemen.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the object of my question, if the Senator will allow me, of course, was simply to obtain some idea if there was any reason advanced by the Secretary of War for his request or suggestion that nothing be now done. I think I am thoroughly acquainted with and impressed and in accord with the views of the chairman of the committee upon the subject of the draft and the necessity of an increased army; I think we understand each other very thoroughly upon that subject. So I was attempting, for my information and that of the Senate, to ascertain whether it was simply a statement that they wanted nothing done prior to the election—of course I know that no statement with reference to the election was made—or whether the status quo was to be maintained at the present time simply upon a statement of the Secretary of War, or whether any valid reasons were given for the request that no action be taken.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If I thought the Secretary of War was small enough or the Chief of Staff was base enough to be influenced in their judgment by the fact that there was an election to come around, I would repudiate the recommendations of either or both.

Mr. FALL. I am convinced of that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But let me say to the Senator that, as I understand, if the Senate is going to take a recess until the 1st of September, they expect to have a report before us at that time, so that we can act. They say that this will not delay for a moment the raising of an army. Gen. Crowder——

Mr. FALL. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Just a moment. Gen. Crowder says that within 24 hours from the time he receives notice that it is desired to register men of any particular class, he can have them registered, and within 60 or 90 days he can have those men classified and ready to be drawn.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator, I presume, has recently seen statements as to exactly how the last registration was brought about; how the necessities of the case were foreseen by Gen. Crowder and his assistant, Col. Johnson; how by forestalling the action of the Congress of the United States before the draft bill was passed the Judge Advocate General, now the Provost Marshal General, succeeded in inaugurating his machinery, so that he could go to work immediately on the adoption of the legislation, and how even the law was, if not evaded directly, set aside or anticipated, at any rate. The machinery to be adopted by Congress, and Congress alone, was forestalled by the action of Gen. Crowder in securing the registration of the men to be drafted under the draft act. Now, with all this machinery provided for in that way, we can proceed much more rapidly, in the event this amendment is adopted, to draft the additional men. There is no doubt that we could proceed with great rapidity, but until Gen. Crowder understands what the draft age is to be it is impossible for him to put that machinery into operation, and only Congress can say whether or not the draft age is to be changed. If the machinery itself were put in operation, it would merely mean the registration of men between 20 and 21 and between 31 and 40, would it not? That would be all that would be done, and it would not cost any more to make that registration at the present time than to make it in September, would it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not at all.

Mr. FALL. It would cost more in September, possibly, because the cost of living is increasing all the time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me state to the Senator one reason they gave, which I did not state.

Mr. FALL. I will be glad to have the Senator do so, for I am seeking information.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They, say, in connection with military registration—and I think probably the statement is true—that if you register a man who is 20, he has no dependents as a rule; he has no ties that make him figure particularly as to his future; but when you register a man who is above 30 the suggestion is made that immediately that man, if he is in industrial life, begins to consider himself as subject to call, with the result that it unsettles him and unsettles his business. He may deem it necessary to close out his business; and it is their desire not to disturb industrial life any further than the demands of the country for men require.

Mr. FALL. Now, Mr. President, would not exactly the same argument apply if you do not now fix the ages of those men who will be called, provided it is understood that we are going to call any others? Now, all this argument is futile——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FALL. I wish to make the point I have in mind, and then I will yield to the Senator. All this argument is absolutely futile, if we have enough men and if we are not going to call other men in addition to those we have in class 1, and it is futile and useless if it is the sense of Congress or of the War Department, that classes 2, 3, 4, and 5 shall be exhausted before others are called. If those questions are to be answered in the affirmative; that is, if we shall not register any others at all, then, of course, there is no necessity for my making the argument which I am making; but so far as unsettling conditions is concerned, will it not very much more unsettle conditions if the age limit is left in the air, as it were, so that men from 31 up to 45 are unable to know whether they may be drafted in the next draft, or men below 21 are unable to know whether they will be drafted? If people know exactly what ages are to be included in the event another draft is to be made, it seems to me that the very argument which they are making, or which they have assigned as one of their reasons to the Senator, answers itself. So far as settling business or unsettling business is concerned, if action is taken now, then every one knows where he stands; if not, it is all up in the air, and no one knows where he stands, and business is unsettled.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Is not the real point, that it is not thought best that Congress should fix the age limit?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I intended to go into this matter a little bit more fully. On yesterday I listened with great interest and some amusement to the argument upon that very point of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. He stated—and I think the RECORD will bear me out—that we should wait until we were told by the War Department, which is now doing so well, just what we should do, although admitting, of course, as others admit, at least sotto voce, that Congress has jurisdiction in these matters. The Senator insisted that, as they were doing so well, Congress should not act at all until told what to do. That is the effect of his language.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FALL. I will yield for a question, but I should like, if the Senator will allow me, to finish the statement, and then possibly he can ask his question and I can answer it more intelligently.

I said that the argument somewhat amused me, because I remember very distinctly when the draft bill was before the Congress, which had been approved by the department, and we were requested to pass it without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," that the Senator from Tennessee secured my vote and the vote of some 30 of my colleagues upon this side for his amendment, which was absolutely opposed by the Commander in Chief and by the War Department. So that it would appear, in answer to the question of the Senator from Massachusetts, that now we are to wait, before we take any action of any kind whatsoever, the further determination of the administration imparted to us, or else we are to wait until a proposed amendment comes from the Democratic side of the Chamber.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think there is an undue amount of confusion as to what the situation is with which the Senate is confronted. In the first place, no committee has considered or reported a proposed change in the draft law. The draft law was fixed by Congress after considerable debate, and no committee has either considered or advocated its change. The Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff did not seek an interview with the Military Affairs Committee. The Military Affairs Committee had not proposed an amendment to the law; but here upon an appropriation bill an effort was made to legislate a change in the draft age, and the chairman of the committee, in order to secure light and in order to secure information, asked the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff and Gen. Crowder to meet with the committee this morning. So that there is no effort on the part of the administration or on the part of the War Department to interfere with the action of Congress.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I was disposed to question the accuracy of the Senator's statement. The Senator said the committee did not propose to change the law with respect to the draft. My recollection is that the law limited the number of men that could be drafted under its provisions to 1,000,000, in installments of 500,000 each, and that the committee does propose to change it in that respect.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I perhaps should have said that there is no proposal by the committee to make a change in the draft age which would make a radical difference and which would create a very decided disturbance in the country.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is another matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, I have laid the foundation by saying that no effort is being made on the part of the War Department to interfere with the act of Congress or the action of Congress upon the draft matter.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there for just a moment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. FALL. One of the very arguments which I had in mind as at least fortifying me in offering this amendment was that the President of the United States had been at times criticized, and by myself among others, because of his interference in the matters belonging purely to the legislative or congressional department of the Government, and that I thought it was the duty of some Senator to relieve him from the onus of that criticism which would be heaped upon him if he came here and insisted upon forcing his own views upon the Congress in this matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I repeat what I said, that we have before us an appropriation bill. The House has considered it. It was passed by the House, came to the Senate, and went to the Senate committee. The Senate committee considered it, and reported it without any proposed change in the draft age. That matter has therefore come before the Senate simply as the result of the proposed amendment upon the floor. In order to meet that emergency the chairman of the committee, himself in favor of changing the draft age, calls the committee together, and asks the representatives of the War Department to come before it for information. The information given to the committee this morning is in substance this: That when we shall have exhausted all available men in Class I of the present draft we will have an army of 3,300,000 men in August. Added to that there will be, as estimated by Gen. Crowder, about 150,000 Canadians that we will bring into the Army as the result of the treaty just ratified, so that we will then have an Army of 3,440,000 men. Now, the highest estimate of the number of those men that we can have in France at that time is 1,450,000, so that when Congress reconvenes after its proposed recess in September we will have in this country at that time over 2,000,000 men and approximately 1,450,000 men in France.

I state these figures to show that there is no emergency as a result of which action should be taken now. There is no hurry for action at the present time; and the War Department prefer, stated frankly, that action should be deferred until they can have fuller information as to the number of ships available for transportation, and fuller information as to other matters which must be had and which can only be had by negotiations with our cobelligerents in this war.

It seems to me that is a very simple proposition. It is simply the judgment of the War Department that to legislate on this matter at this time upon an appropriation bill which has to be passed within a few days is not so wise as to wait until the September meeting, when Congress will be in session and when it will be able to legislate intelligently.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has stated, and I understood the chairman of the committee to state, that there has been no proposition before the committee to change the draft age, and that it came before the committee only after this bill had been reported to the Senate. I have understood right along that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] not only had introduced a resolution calling for information but also that as soon as that committee received the bill from the House it had before it an amendment changing the draft age. If that be true, certainly there must be a mistake on the part of the chairman of the committee or on the part of the Senator from Nebraska, and I have not understood that there has been any action by the committee upon that amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is correct about the resolution of the Senator from Iowa. I meant that the committee had not gone into an investigation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why did not the committee investigate an amendment which was submitted to the committee?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee acted on the amendment, but did not go into an investigation.

Mr. McCUMBER. It acted on it without investigation?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator can take that state of facts as indicating that in the judgment of the committee it was not wise upon this bill to attempt hastily to amend the law as to the ages in the draft; so that the matter is here purely as a spontaneous affair. While I was disposed yesterday to favor the idea of an increase in the draft age, I am now disposed to think, in view of statements made by the representatives of the War Department that it is not necessary, that it can be more properly taken up as a separate matter and considered as a matter of legislation, and not of legislation upon an appropriation bill which must be crowded to passage within a few days.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Nebraska misses the real point.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is quite possible.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt about the power of the Government to get enough soldiers under the present draft law. It is primarily a question of production. I think we are now taking men who ought to be left at home, and that instead of taking them we ought to be taking some men above 30 years of age, and that we are doing this country a vast injury in that selection. Let me ask if the officers of the War Department gave any attention to that phase of the matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We discussed the question purely as to how large an Army we can raise out of Class I, as classified by Gen. Crowder; and that Army appears to be abundant to meet all possibilities of our shipping them to Europe and supplying them there and filling the camps in the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator know that a large number of men both below 21 and above 30 could be taken and put in Class I and assigned to military service to the very great advantage of the country and to the more abundant supply of necessary labor? That is the real question, anyhow. We are short of labor. We could impress any number of men into the Army if we were sure that we could maintain that Army and discharge our obligations abroad. I think that is the phase of the question which the War Department has not considered at all, and possibly does not consider of any importance.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I will say further that it is a question which Congress ought not to consider on an appropriation bill, which is urgently needed, unless it is necessary. The War Department says it is not necessary to decide it now, and they would prefer to have further information before it is taken up.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nebraska must admit that about half or more than half of this bill is general legislation, and does not pertain to appropriations at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is true; but it is also true that it is urgent legislation; and this, according to the statement of the War Department and the figures given, is not urgent at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I have asked the Senator from Tennessee kindly to yield to me to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question; that is all.

I understand that we are not to attempt to fix the draft ages here, although I supposed that was one of the rights of Congress. Are we to be allowed to say how many men shall be raised?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Massachusetts is wrong in the insinuation he makes that the War Department is attempting to interfere with Congress. I have stated already that the representatives of the War Department came down because the chairman of the committee asked them to come and give information. The chairman thought we ought to have this information if we were going to act, and all that the War Department officials did was to come before us and give, in a very mild way, their judgment on the situation. The Senator is indicating that this is an interference with Congress.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; not in the least. Congress is so continually interfered with that it would be the last thing I should attempt to say. When we are interfered with on a constitutional amendment, surely they have a right to interfere with legislation of this kind, and I am not questioning it. I only wanted to know how far we could go. I have a feeling—an old-fashioned feeling, I admit—that under the Constitution the Congress of the United States is intrusted with the raising of armies and also the disciplining of them. In this bill we are not even to be allowed to say that the Army shall not be less than so many men. Now, the reason why I should like to see it stated that the Army to be raised—and I take the appropriations as a basis—shall not be less than 3,000,000 men is not because I am afraid of the administration raising too many men. I am afraid there will not be enough men raised, and that they will not be raised fast enough.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire just for a few moments to refer to two matters, one referred to by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and the other by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. From something that I said yesterday it seems to have been understood by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico that I made the statement that I wanted the Senate to yield its authority to the War Department to settle this draft question. Of course I made no such statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment. Nothing was farther from my purpose. What I meant to say then, and what I mean to say now—and I had had no conversation with any member of the War Department about this matter before I spoke on yesterday—is that this question of changing the draft law had not been considered by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, and so far as I knew had not been recommended by the War Department, and that I thought so important a matter as this should be considered, and carefully considered and weighed, both by the War Department and by the Military Affairs Committee before the Senate acted upon it.

The Senate has appointed the Military Affairs Committee. To make a recommendation on that kind of legislation is one of its functions; that is one of its duties; and surely before we undertake to deal with so important a matter as the age limits of the draft act the Military Affairs Committee ought to consider it and then report to this body about it. In addition to that, I said that we ought to have—and I say it again—advice and facts from the department. The Provost Marshal General, in who we all have the greatest confidence, has charge of this particular matter, and we ought to have advices from his department before we act as a committee, before we make a report to the Senate, and before the Senate acts in this summary way on so important a matter.

That was the position that I took yesterday, and that position I take now. It has been said that because last year I differed with the department as to the volunteer amendment offered by me then I ought to continue to differ with the department now. There is no reason in that. I would be unworthy if I did that. I would be just as willing to differ with the department to-day if I thought the department was wrong.

The fact is that, instead of my taking the part of the department on yesterday, I was acting solely upon my own initiative. I had not talked to the Secretary of War about the draft, or to Gen. March or to any other officer of the department about it, so far as I now recall. I was acting purely on my own initiative in the matter. Naturally, I am pleased to know that the views I expressed on yesterday have been upheld this morning, as shown by the remarks of the chairman of our committee. The fact further is that, instead of being opposed to the draft law last year I was very much in favor of it, the only difference between me and the department last year being that I thought we ought to permit as many as half a million of volunteers to come into our Army. In that position, as I recall, the Senator from New Mexico was with me. I think the department is right in asking that this matter should have careful consideration, and I am willing that it shall have careful consideration before we pass this law.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment, after I yield to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. He asked me to yield first. Before I yield, however, I want to say this:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said awhile ago that we only passed such laws as were submitted by the departments; and I think he referred, as I understood him, to the draft law. Why, the department, as I recollect, recommended that the age limit in the draft law should be from 19 to 25. The Senate wholly disagreed with the department. The Congress fixed the draft age limit from 21 to 31 wholly against the wishes of the department. What the department recommended was from 19 to 25.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Eighteen to 25.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is mistaken. I think it was 19 to 25; but whether it was 18 to 25 or 19 to 25 is immaterial so far as this branch of the Army is concerned. We wholly disagreed with the department, and we changed the ages from 21 to 31, and, according to my recollection, I voted to raise the age as high as 40; and I think it was a very great mistake that the age was not made 40 at that time. But before we make the change—and that is all that I submit to the Senate—let us examine it carefully, and have it reported upon by the Military Affairs Committee, in whom I believe the country and the Senate have considerable confidence.

I now yield to the Senator from California. Does the Senator want to ask me a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; I wanted to add just a word to what the Senator said in respect to what transpired concerning the meeting of the Military Affairs Committee this morning, and the activities of the department in reference to this particular bill.

I am the last one to act as an apologist for the abrogation or the abdication of the functions or powers of Congress; but in this instance, as a simple matter of justice to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, I want to make plain that, of their own motion, neither has suggested or intimated the course Congress should pursue. Yesterday I suggested to the chairman of the Military Committee that we ought to meet this morning on this very important subject—the most important with which we have dealt since the draft itself—and that we ought to ask the Chief of Staff, the Secretary of War, and Gen. Crowder to enlighten us and to give us such details as might enable us intelligently to act. In response to that invitation, suggested by me, and in the suggestion of which I think others joined as well, the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff attended the meeting of the Military Committee this morning. On no occasion did the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff in any fashion suggest or indicate the legislation which we ought to enact, except in response to direct queries by members of the committee, insistently put; and I wanted to make that plain in justice to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff.

If the Senator will allow me just one further observation while I am on my feet, yesterday I was somewhat perplexed with the situation and inclined to vote for the amendment which was before the Senate just prior to adjournment. This morning, after listening to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, and their positive statement that no emergency exists which requires immediate legislation, and realizing the futility of one House legislation of this sort under the circumstances, I am inclined to acquiesce in the determination we reached this morning after listening to their statements upon the subject. I think, however, it ought to be made clear to the country that the draft age will have to be altered within a brief period, and that it is quite likely within 90 days from this date all of class 1 or class A, under the present draft, will have been exhausted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for his interruption.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment. That is exactly in line with what I have contended for here without knowing the department's position. I am frank to say that I did not know of the committee meeting this morning; I was not advised of it. By accident the notice was not left at my office or at my residence. The result is that I was not present. I never talked with the Secretary of War or with Gen. March or Gen. Crowder about the matter, until just a few moments ago I talked with Gen. Crowder as to what took place this morning. What he said was in line with what we ought to do in this case, and I am delighted to know the department has taken the steps it has taken by appearing before the committee.

There are a great many questions about the draft law we have not yet considered in our debate here in the Senate. One is, are we going to permit by this law the new men who come in the draft that is to be hereafter made, or the registration that is hereafter to be made, to be inducted into the Army before those in Class I who already have been put in that class? Those kinds of questions will arise. There are other just as important questions to arise, and they ought to be worked out by the Military Affairs Committee, and they ought to be worked out by that committee with all the facts before them. I have never been a believer in yielding blindly to the department, but we ought to get advice from the department whenever it is necessary in order to legislate intelligently. I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I quite fully concur in the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Tennessee, that the Committee on Military Affairs should consider this proposition. Is it not true that a subcommittee of the committee some time ago had Gen. Crowder before it, and that he made this recommendation?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say that on yesterday for the first time I learned of it. I know that I am a fairly good attendant on the sessions of the Committee on Military Affairs. If Gen. Crowder ever appeared there, then the subcommittee, in effect, reported adversely by not reporting the amendment. At all events, in so far as this particular amendment is concerned, the committee on Military Affairs has reported against it by not reporting it. They certainly have not recommended it to this body, and we have not considered it as a committee. What the subcommittee may have done I do not know.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming, who was on the subcommittee, and he can tell what took place before it.

Mr. WARREN. I will state to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] that some members of the subcommittee were considering an amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and it was reported that the Provost Marshal General agreed substantially with that amendment. Therefore he was invited to come to the committee room and state his views. He stated that there was much in the France amendment that he approved, but that he would reach the result in an entirely different way. When pressed for his ideas, he stated distinctly that he would only express his personal opinion about it. He stated that very soon the entire class 1 would be drawn if the schedule proposed was carried out—that is, by January, as he put it, and afterwards his assistant said December, probably—and that in the later drafts the ages would have to be extended, in his opinion, in both directions, unless men were to be taken from classes 2, 3, and 4. He then again said, in brief, that it was his opinion and that he thought the Secretary of War believed that the time had not yet arrived when it should be initiated.

Mr. WATSON. That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. WARREN. If I may add a word, the Secretary is of the opinion, and Gen. Crowder is of the opinion, that when those ages are extended they ought to embrace enough both below and above so that we should not have to make another registration soon.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator from Tennessee will yield, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming when was Gen. Crowder before the committee?

Mr. WARREN. It was one day, I think, this week, or probably the last of last week.

Mr. WATSON. So he was before the subcommittee, and this very matter was under consideration, and Gen. Crowder stated that there would be a shortage of troops by the 1st of January.

Mr. WARREN. No; but that class 1 would be exhausted. He did not put it as a shortage of troops.

Mr. WATSON. I understand; but an exhaustion of the class.

Mr. WARREN. Of No. 1.

Mr. WATSON. Of No. 1; and that in his opinion the age would have to be lowered and raised?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. That was a week ago?

Mr. WARREN. It was the first part of this week or the last of last week.

Mr. WATSON. What I wanted to get at is, if this very subject matter has been considered, a matter of such overwhelming importance, why it was that the Committee on Military Affairs did not take up the proposition and consider it?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will just permit me, for the reason that the Committee on Military Affairs had submitted this bill to a subcommittee for report, and if the subcommittee considered it they turned it down, because they did not report it to the full committee, and the full committee has not considered it. Whether we have been in error in not considering it, whether we ought to have devoted more time to it than we did, is another question; but, at all events, in all the matters that come before the committee that has not been done.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say just a word in the absence of the chairman. I have answered the question, but I shall be glad if my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], will further answer it.

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that when Gen. Crowder came to the committee he did not appear before the subcommittee at all, but by an arrangement between the chairman of our committee and the House committee to consider certain measures which had passed the Senate and were on the House calendar, and to have those measures placed upon the appropriation bill, and the subcommittee was not in session. I believe the Senator from Wyoming was present and the chairman was present, but other members of the subcommittee were not present and were not expected to be present at that time.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that he is stating the exact condition. The chairman and the ranking member of the minority of the House were by arrangement in consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and, it is assumed, the ranking minority member. One or two other Senators were present, and it was during the consideration of those matters which had already passed the Senate as to whether or no that proposed legislation should be put upon the appropriation bill, to facilitate matters at another place and secure very much needed legislation.

Mr. BECKHAM. So this question of the draft age was mentioned only incidentally?

Mr. WARREN. That in a way is true.

Mr. BECKHAM. And it was not before the subcommittee of the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. It was not before the entire subcommittee.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask a question of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have had the pleasure of reading the testimony of Gen. Crowder as it was taken down before the committee. I do not intend to reveal any confidence, but I think it entirely proper to say that if his testimony upon that point was incidental, the volume of the principal subjects considered must have been very great, because he discussed the question throughout 30 pages of typewritten matter, and, so far as I observe, substantially his entire attention was given to the draft age and matters connected with the exhaustion of certain classes.

Mr. BECKHAM. The Senator from Iowa may be correct about that. As a member of the subcommittee I was not present, and I think probably two other members were not present at that time. When I said that his statements on the draft age were incidental, it was based upon the idea that he came before this committee of the two Houses, you might say—the chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and the chairman of the House committee and its ranking minority member—to consider a number of measures which it was thought wise to place upon this bill. In that meeting I understand that something was said about the draft age, but the point I make is that it was never considered by the subcommittee of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. If I may be further allowed, he stated that he had some figures, and, if the gentlemen present wished, he would include those in his remarks. So his statement may have contained all those figures.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree with very much the Senator from Tennessee has said. It is entirely proper for the committee to hear the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and other members of that department, to get information that will throw light on matters of legislation. Personally I am in favor of the draft being enlarged and raising the age limit. The thing I want to make certain and have the people of the United States understand is that under the present law ample men can be obtained to furnish an army three or four times larger than we can transport to France within the next year.

That is what the American people are interested in. I do not desire that the President, the Commander in Chief, shall be denied a single man that the military authorities of this country think necessary to conduct this war to a successful termination.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Tennessee, if it is his understanding, and he has given great thought and study to this question, that under the present law, unamended, an army of 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 men could be raised for service in France, if so desired?

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely. I will say that I have talked with Gen. Crowder within the hour and he says that there are some 6,000,000 men who could be put into the draft at any time under the present law, and they are——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will not the Senator qualify that?

Mr. McKELLAR. They are in classes 1, 2, 3, 4, and under the selective-draft law as it was argued on this floor when it was passed it ought to be made to apply to all alike.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in just one moment. So far as I am concerned, all I can say is that I realize that there ought to be an enlargement of the draft age. It must necessarily come, and we ought to be certain that we are right when we do change it. That is my whole position about it. I think the Committee on Military Affairs ought to have the right and the duty ought to be imposed upon it to examine into all the facts and report to this body before passing legislation of this drastic kind. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. What I wanted to ask the Senator is if he agrees with the statement made by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] that class 1 under the present draft will be exhausted in 90 days?

Mr. McKELLAR. I was not so informed by Gen. Crowder. To class 1 must be added the very large number, probably half a million men, the additional men who will be put in that class as soon as the questionnaire is answered under the draft law of June 5 last.

Mr. NORRIS. The statement has been made here several times, I think on both sides of the Chamber, by members of the committee, that the present draft, as far as class 1 is concerned, will be exhausted some say in September and others say in January.

If that be true must we not do one or two things to equip the Army and keep it up where it ought to be and raise a sufficient number of men, must we not either take classes 2, 3, and 4 under the present ages or extend the age limit and take those above 31 who would be classified in class 1? Is it not a great deal better that we should increase the age limit and take from class 1, who are above 31 rather than take classes 2, 3, 4, and 5 under the present classification?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether the Senator is correct about that or not. I think it would be exceedingly wise to put all unmarried men in good physical condition between 31 and 40 in the draft. I do not think there is any doubt about that. We all agree on that. But I do not agree with the Senator about the second part of the proposition. I think there are a great many men in the second, third, and fourth classes in the present draft who ought not to be there.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think there ought to be a reclassification of those men.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be, too.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I think we can get all the men who are necessary by this reclassification.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me suggest to the Senator that Congress can not reclassify those men. The department must do it. I have no disposition to do anything but accept their classification; but it seems to me there are a good many reasons why we should not take men who are in the deferred classes who have families to support or who are connected with some occupation that is necessary to keep the Army going. They should not be taken as long as there are other men above 31 who could be taken without interfering with any business of that kind.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator from Tennessee will allow me——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield. I yield the floor.

Mr. FALL. Very well, Mr. President, then I will undertake to answer the Senator from Nebraska. I said when the original draft law was before this body that it was a measure of preparedness but not an emergency measure. I said then, and I say now, and I followed it by words then which apply to your provisions now, that it is not intended to allow the President, as you hold it out to the world, to raise an unlimited number of men, but that in itself it restricts him and prevents him by law, as the original draft law did, the Senator from Tennessee to the contrary notwithstanding, from raising an army such as we should have to deal with the present situation.

I take issue with the Senator from Tennessee entirely in his legal conclusion, much to my regret, of course. The draft act prohibits in terms the selection of certain men within the registered age. It does not allow and can not allow all the total of 8,000,000 men without a plain, clear violation of the act of Congress itself. It can not allow the raising of 6,000,000 or 4,000,000 men. Classes such as the Senator from Nebraska has referred to, necessary in munition works or in naval work or in other necessary work for carrying on this war, are provided by law to be exempted from military service and they can not legally be drafted into such service. They can be drafted into semimilitary service under the terms of the law which Congress passed, but not into the fighting line, not into the combat force.

The terms of the law are perfectly plain. It was passed after discussion. I remember very distinctly that the discussion of the subject was brought about when I was upon my feet making some remarks by a question asked me by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] as to the exact construction of this provision of the proposed law. There was no difference of opinion in so far as the RECORD shows:

> No person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant—

> and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes—

Those persons who can be exempted from any military service or can be drafted only for partial military service by the President. Let us see who they are:

> County or municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mail; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States; and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate—

Distinct classes are referred to, and the President is prohibited by the terms of the law from drafting them, although they may be within the draft age, from 21 to 31, except for partial military service—

> pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces—

There the President has a discretion; he can declare as to whether or not a person engaged in agriculture is necessary to the proper employment of the military forces. He can find him so necessary or not, and as to that man his judgment is final; but as to the other classes to which I have referred he has no judgment whatsoever, except that he may draft them into the semimilitary service—not into the military service.

Take all the mail employees, all those employed in the production of munitions and in the armories, all those employed in the vocations mentioned specifically here whose drafting is prohibited, and tell me, then, how many men you have left of the total registration of 800,000? Remember, as I say, that their drafting for military purposes is prohibited by law. Now, you go before the people of the country by the provision proposed to be enacted in this bill under discussion, and you tell those people that they are complying with the President's suggestion when, in speaking of the proposed army of 5,000,000 men, he says why limit it to 5,000,000; that there should be no limitation whatsoever; and when he asks you to give him full authority, and you pretend to have done it while you have done nothing of the kind, but you have again restricted him, because you have left in the draft both those prohibitions which preclude his selection or his summoning into the draft, into the military forces of the United States, millions of the men registered in the ages between 21 and 31. Again, you are restricting the hands of your Commander in Chief if he demands an army for the proper defense of the country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that the Senator on yesterday gave the information for which I intended to ask, but, if he did so, I either did not hear it or I have forgotten it. I want to get the Senator's judgment on the exhaustion of class 1. Under the present registration and within the present age limit, how soon will that class be exhausted?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] gave the information, and, I judge with accuracy, that by the 1st of September all of those in class 1 would be exhausted. I think that was the date he gave.

Mr. REED. About the 15th of September.

Mr. FALL. About the 15th of September.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to ask a further question. Assuming that to be true, then, in order to keep on increasing the Army and to have them trained and ready to transport to France, will it not be necessary either to extend the age limit or to take classes 2, 3, and so forth, under the present registration?

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly, Mr. President; and when you go to classes 2, 3, 4, and 5, what do you find? You find millions in those classes who are working as artisans in munition factories, in the navy yards, and in other capacities in necessary war work, directly for the Government, and Congress itself has provided that, as to those men, the law excludes them, and they can not be taken.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, everybody recognizes, I think, that when you commence to take class 2, and as you go on, it gets worse in different classes. You are interfering with the necessary support of the Army at home. Now, is not this the question that it finally resolves itself into: Either we must take those classes, and thus interfere with the production of food or material to support the Army, or we must extend the age limit, and get somebody who at present is beyond the age limit prescribed for class 1?

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly, Mr. President. That is so simple and plain that I can not understand what objection can be made to it, except that stated by one of the Senators, though not as coming from himself—I refer to the statement of the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee—that it had been suggested as one of the reasons for not taking this action now—and this is the only reason which has appealed in any respect whatsoever to my judgment—that if you now provide for the drafting of these men up to 40 years of age it might incommode them in some way or might cause them to begin to arrange their business so that they could answer the draft.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. When that very question was answered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] I wanted to interrupt the Senator for the purpose of asking that if we do not raise the age limit and have such an arrangement made as would mentally discommode those who are now beyond the age limit, is it not true that if we do not do that we are interfering with the mental disturbance of the men in classes 2 and 3, so that we are going to interfere with somebody's mental operation no matter what we do? If we extend the age limit and thus run the risk of doing what the Senator suggests as to those above 31, we relieve at the same time the mental disturbance that would exist in those in classes 2 and 3 under present conditions.

Mr. FALL. The suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska is, of course, apropos and is unanswerable. Then we might proceed to discuss the difference between the mental suffering or disturbance of the single man above 31, who knows that he will be drafted, and the mental disturbance and suffering of the wife and child dependent upon the man who must go in his place under the present provisions of this bill. It would be a very interesting field, Mr. President; but I am not voyaging now upon the sea of sentimentality, but am endeavoring to discuss what I think is the practical need of the moment from purely a practical standpoint.

Mr. President, I will proceed now to discuss the present law a little further. I have said that it was a restrictive measure. It is perfectly apparent, with due respect to the Senator from Tennessee, that his statement made here so solemnly that we can secure 6,000,000 additional men under the present draft law, is nonsense, unless we propose to violate the terms of the law itself. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the wording of the draft law and its punctuation in my endeavor to construe it fairly and to state those propositions which are beyond all question, and then leave to their determination those propositions concerning which there may be certain questions. I have read the list of those who are exempted by law in the various classifications. I have read the list of those who are clearly to be exempted in the judgment of the President. Now, there are other distinct classes not merged with either of the classes referred to, and concerning which the Judge Advocate General has made a decision by virtue of the operation of his orders, without directly making a legal decision upon the subject in question. That class is covered by this clause of the draft act:

Those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable.

On reading this law it will be discovered that there is a question as to whether every man who has a dependent family or others dependent upon him for support is not by the law itself excluded. As I have said, they are placed in a separate classification, and by the wording itself this classification relates back to the word "only."

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator read it again?

Mr. FALL. At the request of the Senator from Nebraska, I will read the entire paragraph, with the punctuation:

And the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mail; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate—

Leaving to the President the designation of other persons who are exempt, but exempting by law the persons named—pilots, mariners—

Exempting by law pilots and mariners—

actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary—

There is, of course, a matter of discretion—to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency—

And there ends the discretion. Then, relating back—

those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support, which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable—

Unless the word "advisable" was there, there could be no question whatsoever that the draft law itself distinctly excludes from its provisions those who have dependents upon them for support—and those found to be physically or morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists.

I say, Mr. President, that the Congress of the United States restricted the raising of an army because it enumerated classes from which the President should not draw combat troops. I say that there would be no question whatsoever in my mind, were it not for the use of the word "advisable," that those with dependents upon them were equally excluded by operation of law from the provisions of the draft act.

Now, in the bill pending before us the committee has reported the following amendment—and still some Senators deprecate the fact that there is any discussion upon the draft law at all—

That the authority conferred upon the President by the act approved May 18, 1917—

Which is the act from which I have just been reading—entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," is hereby extended so as to authorize him during each fiscal year to raise by draft as provided in said act and acts amendatory thereof the maximum number of men which may be organized, equipped, trained, and used during such year for the prosecution of the present war until the same shall have been brought to a successful conclusion.

Mr. President, what does that mean? The committee apparently entertain the idea that this is in compliance with the suggestion that 5,000,000 men be raised, as amended by the President's question, "Why place any limit?" Therefore, ostensibly the committee has brought before the Senate for adoption a provision placing no limit upon the power of the President to raise men. Let us examine that proposition for a moment. The statement is made here, uncontradicted from the record—and I think it comes from the statement of Gen. Crowder himself—that on or before September 15 class 1 under the present draft act will have been exhausted, and that from thence on we must proceed to draft men from classes 2, 3, 4, and 5, if we are to obtain additional men; but remember, Senators, that among these classes all those working in munition plants, all those working in arsenals, all those working in navy yards, or other operations which I have mentioned, are exempted by law. Now, what classes are not clearly exempted by the law itself from the draft?

Who will remain, in other words, subject even to the discretionary action of the President? Only those having dependent families and farmers working upon the farms of the United States, and from the farmers and from those having dependent families only can the President, after the 15th of September, add one to the number of combat forces of the United States. Still this law is held out to the people of the United States as proposing to create an enormous additional army.

Mr. President, it is pure camouflage, if I may use that much-hackneyed term. It raises no additional army, because the President now has the unlimited right by the law itself to organize special forces from those in the draft, and in this manner he has organized some 40 per cent of the total that we are told now are enlisted in the aggregate of 2,000,000 of United States forces. He is restricted by the terms of the act with reference to the combat forces of the National Army to raising 1,000,000 men, and then certain skeleton recruit regiments. This is the only restriction upon him there, and in this respect the limit is raised by the proposition to allow him to go beyond that million men and skeleton regiments; but the fact remains, and can not be controverted, that in securing the additional men he is confined to those two classes, those placed in the deferred classification because of the fact that they have families dependent upon them and those engaged in agricultural pursuits. From these two classes alone can he, under the authority vested in him here, raise an additional soldier. Yet we are told that we must not raise the age limit and that in class 1 there may be from 2,000,000 to 5,000,000 men raised who are not subject to the operations of this law preventing their draft and who have not dependents upon them for support. This is the sole proposition presented by the amendment which I offer, and it has been discussed from every possible standpoint; but, as I have said, the law itself as it stands, and the procedure under which we have been acting as we have been acting, has been referred to in only a very few words except as I have now called the attention of the Senate to it.

I spoke this morning of the amusement with which I had listened to one of the speeches made upon this floor yesterday, when a Senator took me to task somewhat for having dared, for having had the temerity, to offer an amendment at this time until I had been authorized directly so to do by the Commander in Chief or by some officer of the Army or of the War Department. I admit that it did require some temerity; and only what I conceive, possibly mistakenly, to be my duty to the people of this country to call their attention to the absolutely farcical proposition here held up to them as authorizing the increase of their armed forces would have caused me to offer the amendment. My object has been largely gained, whether the amendment is voted down, as it will be, or whether it is adopted, as it should be. At least the discussion has served to call the attention of the people of the country to the fact that under the pretense of greatly enlarging the power by giving the President a so-called unlimited power the committee offers nothing whatsoever. We are back again where we were in 1915.

I listened with great interest to the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who, I can most truthfully say, is my personal friend. For his ability and his sincerity and his integrity of purpose I have the very greatest admiration; but, sir, listening to him yesterday, I recalled the fact that on February 21, 1915, I sat equally charmed and listened to him when he accused myself, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and other Senators here of being militarists because we were then urging preparation for what we knew, and what it seemed to me any man of common sense would know, must come about—the entrance of this country into this great world war. He refused to vote a dollar, and he declaimed against the appropriation of one cent for increasing the Military or Naval Establishment of the United States. His argument, I may say, was much better put then than it was yesterday, and much more appealing to my good judgment then than it was yesterday, because, summed up, it was a hope held out to the enemy when he said yesterday that we had reached our limit and could go no further in our preparation for the world war; when, in objecting to the proposal that there might be placed at the disposal of the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief, millions more of men, and objecting to the adoption of this amendment he said that we could not use them; that we were up to our limit now; that all the forces at our command were now being used by the War Department; and that this amendment should be defeated because we had reached our limit; and in one portion of his argument, Mr. President, he rather impressed me with the idea—of course he did not intend it—that in his judgment it would require more tonnage to support in France a man of 20 years without a dependent family than to support a man of 30 years with a dependent family behind him in the United States. Of course, this is a reductio ad absurdum, but, nevertheless, I would be justified in inferring from that portion of his argument that that was his conclusion.

Mr. President, in the proposition to amend this law so as to place an unlimited army at the command of the President of the United States I have been absolutely sincere. I have no pride of authorship in the amendment. When the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] came to me yesterday with his proposition providing for the draft of certain alien citizens not already provided for, including alien citizens of neutral countries, I agreed with him at once that as I had, after consultation with other Senators, concluded to perfect my amendment by striking out "18" and "45" and inserting "20" and "40," if he would do the same thing I would advocate his proposal as a substitute for mine. My object is action, and I care not under whose name it comes. I know that it is much easier to obtain action from the Senate in a matter of this kind when it is proposed from a Member of the majority—necessarily so. This is a Government of majorities and a Government of parties, and I realize that those upon the other side are in much more close touch with the administration at this time, and that therefore any proposal which comes from them will receive at least more support than one coming from this side. Therefore, in the interest of my country, as I believe, I welcomed most cheerfully the suggestion that the Senator from Nebraska should substitute my amendment by his; and I will vote now to substitute his, and he will now vote against his own substitute.

Mr. President, I am intensely in earnest in this matter, and if there is any freedom of the press in the United States yet, I want it to go out and be understood distinctly by the people of the United States that in following the advice of the Commander in Chief or of the War Department as the committee have followed it in wording the provision which they have presented for our adoption, instead of allowing the President of the United States to raise an unlimited army, they are retaining in the law the provisions of the present act absolutely restricting him in providing such an army at all, and that instead of raising an army of 5,000,000 or 6,000,000, which is the limit as placed by the eloquent Senator from Tennessee, instead of allowing the President of the United States to go to that limit the Congress of the United States has cut him off, and that until we repeal the law now upon the statute books the President of the United States, according to my guess, could not go through these classes and raise an additional army of 2,000,000; and I say, whether he could or could not, that army under the provisions of the law itself would necessarily be raised from the agricultural labor of the United States and from those having families dependent upon them for support.

Mr. President, again I invite the attention of the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the committee. If I am in error in my conclusions, if I am in error in the statement which I have made here, and which I now make solemnly, that you are restricting the authority of the President of the United States instead of giving him additional authority, if those statements can be controverted I shall be glad to change my conclusions and to express my change upon the floor with the same frankness with which I have expressed what I have had to say now.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, on yesterday, in the course of the debate, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] stated that he had seen in the papers not long since that 640,000 gross tons of shipping had been lost during the month of May. I was, as no doubt others were, very much astonished at those figures, so I took occasion to inquire this morning at the Navy Department, and was informed that the total losses for the month of May, with the exception of the last three days, for which figures had not yet been compiled, were 233,639 gross tons. Now, if the average for those 28 days in May was carried out for the last three days, that would make a total of about 258,671 tons.

I feel sure that the Senator himself will be relieved to get those figures, and to be told that that is the total loss of neutral and allied shipping for that month.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, prior to the final report that was made by the British Admiralty, in which they frankly covered all of the sinkings of all of the allies and of neutrals during the year 1917, I had carefully prepared monthly tables myself. Those monthly tables, I learned, compared very closely with the estimates that had been made from German sources; and when the year was closed, and the British Admiralty made their final statement, their statement showed the sinkings to be a little more than the amount given by the German authorities. Now, I have found that as a rule the German reports have not been exaggerated. I have rather learned to place greater reliance upon them than upon the weekly reports which we have been receiving from other sections of the world; and I admit that this is the report made from the enemy side, the report that was made on June 23 of this year. It comes from Amsterdam:

> Ship tonnage sunk by German submarines in the month of May aggregated 614,000 gross tons.

I said yesterday 640,000, because I was speaking from memory only. The tonnage here is given as 614,000.

This is according to the official statement issued in Berlin. The assertion also was made that in addition badly damaged ships, with a tonnage of 56,000 tons, were taken to ports of the entente allies in April, besides the losses already announced for that month.

I will state frankly that I place greater reliance upon the reports of actual losses when they come from the central powers than I have placed upon those of our allies, because I have found that in the press of the country we are so liable to exaggerate our own successes and underestimate the successes of the enemy, and because, as I have stated, the final summing up by the British Admiralty of the results of the 1917 destruction agreed within a very few tons with the statements made by the German Admiralty. So I have taken it at least from the records. I hope that the record the Senator has given as coming from our Navy Department is accurate.

Mr. BECKHAM. It is accurate, so I am informed, as to the month of May, with the exception of the last three days, for which figures have not yet been compiled. I am inclined to think, and I believe the Senator will agree, that such statements from a department of our Government can be better relied upon than those from the German Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. In the early part of 1917, and in fact during all of 1917, I must say to the Senator, that they were very unreliable, and did not agree at all with the British Admiralty reports as they were finally summed up; the British reports showing, in fact, that the sinkings were almost double what our own reports accounted for.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, before indulging in a discussion of this question, I desire to say that I was completely surprised when the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee at the convening of the Senate this morning mentioned the meeting of that committee. I was not present at that meeting for the reason that I received no notice whatsoever of it, and what transpired there is all news to me.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I make a statement to the Senator in that connection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The request to the Secretary of War and these other gentlemen to come up was not determined upon until last evening at 5 o'clock. Immediately notices were prepared and placed in the hands of special messengers, with the request that the notices be delivered at the homes of the Senators; so that the notices were sent, although they may not have been received.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will yield to me, I think that this information and this question ought to be discussed before a larger number of Senators than are here now. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Guion	Martin	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hale	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Hardwick	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Henderson	Norris	Sterling
Calder	Hitchcock	Nugent	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Hollis	Overman	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Thompson
Curtis	Kellogg	Pittman	Tillman
Dillingham	Kendrick	Poindexter	Trammell
Fall	Kenyon	Pomerene	Underwood
Fernald	King	Ransdell	Vardaman
France	Kirby	Reed	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Robinson	Walsh
Gallinger	Lewis	Shafroth	Watson
Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard	Weeks
Gore	McKellar	Shields	Wolcott
Gronna	McNary	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, when I was interrupted by a call for a quorum I was saying to the Senate that I had not attended the meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs this morning owing to the fact that through some slip or oversight, of course it was unintentional, no notice of that meeting reached me, and the first news I received as to what transpired in that meeting was when the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs rose in his place this morning and described the meeting and said who was there. I listened with a great deal of interest to the reasons recited by the chairman of the committee—those reasons I mean which were put forth by the Secretary of War in urging, or suggesting at least, that for the time being, and perhaps for an indefinite period, no enlargement of the draft should be attempted by the Congress. As I listened to those reasons, I could not help reviewing in my own mind very rapidly, probably very incompletely, some of the salient features of this war since it started on August 1, 1914. I am going to attempt to draw a lesson from it in connection with this very matter. I shall not consume much time in doing this, but I think it is pertinent to the discussion and to the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, it is well known that the German Empire was the only one of all the great nations completely prepared to launch itself into a war at a moment's notice. That is now conceded; in fact, it was conceded within a few weeks after the war started. The British Navy, of course, was completely prepared, but the British land forces were utterly inadequate to meet any such catastrophe as Germany had been preparing for 40 years to inflict upon the world.

Lord Roberts traveled about England warning his countrymen that some day a blow would be struck and urging them, begging them, to create an army to ward off that blow and possibly to prevent war altogether. He was unsuccessful; in fact, his advice was derided, his motives even were questioned by some of the highest officials in the British Government in the period prior to the outbreak of the war. We went through something of the same experience. The senior officer of the American Army begged and implored his countrymen through three or four years that they realize and comprehend the danger that confronted them. Little, if any, attention was given to his warning, and now we know that Lord Roberts was right, and the English people know it, and now I believe the American people know that Leonard Wood was right.

After starting in that kind of atmosphere, Mr. President, four years of war have given a constant repetition of Germany doing things first. One incident after another has transpired which has shown that the allies, severally or collectively, have not foreseen and prepared for the emergencies which might overtake them as the war progressed. Of course, the first invasion of Belgium by Germany could not have been anticipated because the civilized world did not realize that Germany would so brutally disregard a solemn treaty compact, and so the element of surprise which accompanied that invasion into Belgium and through Belgium into northern France is one for which the allied leaders could not be blamed. But from that date on, Senators, one thing after another has happened which has shown that the German general staff has been constantly projecting its mind into the future, has been forcing the war, has been taking the initiative, and it has become increasingly apparent as the four weary years have gone on that they have planned this thing in advance in every detail.

So it was, Mr. President, that Bulgaria, through carefully contrived schemes and combinations of diplomatic chicanery and bribery, was brought into this war as an ally of the Teutonic powers, while the allied powers were waiting to see what might be done about it. So it was with Serbia, Mr. President. While the allied powers were wondering if they could be of any service to Serbia, their faithful little ally was overrun by the combined forces of Bulgaria, Austria, and Germany. The allies did not come to the assistance of little Serbia, and look at the result, an open pathway for the Teutonic powers to Constantinople and to Asia Minor, linking up the great Turkish Empire with the entire Balkan region and clear on north to Hamburg—a great Mittel Europa, planned out in advance, accomplished while the entente allies were wondering whether they should or could do something about it.

In the nick of time, it is true, and by overcoming serious difficulties of different kinds, the allies saved Greece, but it was by a hair's breadth; and we now know that the overrunning of Greece and the use of her littoral as a base for submarines was within the German intentions at the very outbreak of the war. The Grecian King, of marked German sympathies, did his best to bring that about, but in this case the situation was saved.

Witness Roumania. While Russia, then a belligerent, and while the other allies, then belligerents as now, were wondering if something could be done to help Roumania, who had come into the war, she is overrun, crushed—because the preparations had not been made to protect her before she became an ally of the entente powers. See the result. The mouth of the Danube and the whole stretch of that great inland waterway stretching up from the Black Sea into the heart of the Austrian Empire is made a German line of transportation.

Witness Russia to-day. Will any Senator deny or doubt the statement that Germany had planned from the very first news she received that there was a possibility of a revolution in Russia to control that revolution for her own purposes through her propaganda? There can be no doubt about it; and she did it, and she is doing it to-day, Senators, while we stand to one side and watch her do it and wonder whether we can stop it. Germany has taken the initiative in nearly every great event of this war.

In my judgment we ourselves have been guilty of this same lack of foresight since we have been in the war. Senators know, I think they realize, that America did not really wake up in this contest until the German drive started on March 21 last and threatened to be completely successful. Then it was that we began sending troops in great force to France. Then it was that those in power realized, if, indeed, they did not before, and I do not say they did not, that this was a desperate fight; and we have waked up to it and the country is aroused.

Many of the undertakings put into effect by our supply departments, and the character of those undertakings, lead one to believe that we have not been thinking ahead far enough. Luckily we have now made our plans with our allies, but the history of the months of the summer of 1917 in our preparations for this war indicate very clearly that we were on the road to making the same mistakes which had been made by our allies during the three years prior to our entrance into the war—failure to look ahead and instantly prepare for every emergency that might overtake us while the war is in progress.

Now, here we come to this very question to-day. The Provost Marshal General states that by the middle of September under the present program of drafting men into the Army class 1 will be exhausted. I have it on the most reliable authority that class 1 will be exhausted on September 15. Let us be liberal about it and make it October 1 or October 15. Yet it is now proposed to the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and to the Senate itself that we do nothing about that for a while; that we wait and see whether it is possible for the United States to use a larger army; whether it will create any industrial disturbance if we enlarge and expand the limits of the draft.

Mr. President, the General Staff, of course, lays out well in advance the program for raising troops. It is the duty of the Provost Marshal General to raise the troops needed by the General Staff. Those troops can not be raised beyond October 15 without going into class 2, and class 3 unless, indeed, it is decided not to raise any more troops after that date. I contend that that assertion can not be denied.

It has been intimated in the Senate this morning by the chairman of the committee, who merely recited what was said by the Secretary of War, that it would be all right for the Congress to wait until some time in September to decide this question, and that within 60 or 90 days thereafter the troops can be obtained. May I ask what is to be done during the months of October, November, and December? Is the calling of troops to be suspended after the middle of October while the preparations are being made in the Provost Marshal General's office for the calling of additional troops under an expanded draft at the expiration of 60 or 90 days?

Mr. President, supposing there does not appear very clearly at this moment any absolute necessity for an enlargement of the American Army after October 15, is it wise for us to proceed upon that basis? Can we not get out of that habit of mind which leads us to endeavor to meet emergencies after they overtake us, a habit of mind that has been all too prevalent, Senators, in this country and in the management of this war at large, not only by ourselves but by our allies? Can we not anticipate the emergencies that may overtake us? Is it not safer? Is it not making war with greater effectiveness for the Congress at this day and date to place at the disposal of the President a sufficient number of registrants under the draft to enable him to get just as big an army as he wants to meet any emergency, and preferably to prepare for that emergency before it comes?

It passes my understanding how those responsible for the conduct of the military preparations of this great Republic can solemnly advise us at this day that for the time being nothing more is desired; that we do not have to do anything yet. Oh, if we could wipe out of our dictionary the words "not yet"!

Mr. President, I do not know what transpired in the Military Committee this morning in detail. I was going to ask the chairman of the committee if any questions were asked there of the Provost Marshal General or the Chief of Staff or the Secretary of War by way of finding out what the program for raising troops is for the remainder of the calendar year 1918. I have been informed of some of that program. I do not know it all, but I know that by October 15, in order to carry it on through the next three succeeding months we have got to go into class 2 and class 3 or else stop raising troops during those months. I was going to ask the chairman of the committee in my own time if he could state whether that subject was gone into.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think nearly every subject was gone into, because there were some there who radically differed in their views from the views entertained by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff. With reference to that particular change, it appeared just after the August draft, which is an unusually large one, there would be still something like 650,000 men of class 1 subject to the draft, and in addition to those it was thought that at least 150,000 additional men would be rendered subject to the draft by reason of the treaties which have just been entered into between the United States and Great Britain and some of the other cobelligerents. Still further, it was assumed that there would be additional men on a reclassification who would be brought into class 1. For instance, I believe it was stated that by combing, as they call it, and reclassifying the men in the District of Columbia there would be added 2,000 of class 1 who were not heretofore included in it. In other words, it was thought there would be enough men subject to the draft during the months of September and October.

Mr. WADSWORTH. How about November and December?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think there was a difference of opinion. The Senator knows what Gen. Crowder's views were, and I think there was a difference of opinion between Gen. Crowder and the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War. The Chief of Staff was very emphatic in stating that he indorsed the views of the Secretary of War with reference to it.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from New York permit me to propound a question to the chairman of the committee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee how many men are now in cantonments?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I forget really what the number is.

Mr. KING. There are not sufficient to fill the cantonments?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are filling them as men are taken under the draft.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think I can answer that question. My recollection is that Gen. March stated that the number in cantonments at the present time is approximately 1,350,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are enlarging the cantonments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentlemen who testified before the committee, then, apparently realized that class 1 is about to be exhausted. Otherwise they would not advocate combing other classes and reclassifying in order to get more men into class 1, nor would they put such reliance upon the number of men who are citizens of Canada and Great Britain now residing in this country in order to meet the situation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it is fair to say that the testimony of the representatives of the War Department before the committee was that before class 1 was exhausted or when it was exhausted we would have 1,450,000 men in Europe and 2,000,000 men in the United States.

I am sure the Senator does not favor the idea of calling men into the service before they can either be accommodated in the cantonments or sent to Europe.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have not said anything about the number of men who ought to be called. My complaint is that without the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico you can not call them.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to preface my question by a statement. In the first place, I am cordially in favor of changing the limit of the draft age, and in the next place I am very heartily in favor of coordination between the executive department and Congress. Suppose Congress adopts the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico and fixes the draft age at 20 to 40, what will it avail if it is the policy of the War Department not to accelerate the training of men and calling them into the service? In other words, what will the enactment of this amendment accomplish at this time if the department is opposed to speeding the training of men?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if such an unbelievable situation existed in the War Department the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico would do no good at all, but I can not believe that any such spirit lives there. What I want to see done is the bringing about of a situation in our military preparations whereby when an emergency makes itself apparent over the horizon, coming our way in the shape of a big, dark cloud, the President and the War Department can act quickly in repelling it, and if the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico or something approximating it is not adopted, then they could not meet that emergency. I for one, Mr. President, am tired of having our country overtaken by emergencies for which we are unprepared.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I wish to ask the Senator if Gen. March and the Secretary of War are right in saying that in so far as the number of troops we have in France and our preparations at this time are concerned we are five months ahead of our plans, then is it not absolutely apparent that the Secretary of War is still five months behind in his plans? Is not that a logical and necessary sequence? We are five months ahead of his plans. It is necessary for us to have the troops in Europe, and we find he is still five months behind in his plans. Then how, in the name of all that is right, can we pay any attention to his plans for the present emergency if he is still five months behind in his plans?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I say very frankly to the Senator from New Mexico that I have never been able to analyze the plans of the Secretary of War.

Mr. FALL. But the Senator recalls a statement of the Secretary of War, and particularly of the Chief of Staff, that we are now five months ahead of our plans.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was not present at the meeting and I did not hear the statement. It is the first time I ever heard of it.

Mr. FALL. It has been published in every paper, I think, in the United States in the last three weeks. I could fill the RECORD with quotations directly from the Chief of Staff. I am not responsible for them, but the public press is my ordinary source of information.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The only statement about being five months ahead of time that I can recall is the statement of the Secretary of War, published in the Official Bulletin, of February 21, in which he announced the shipment to Europe of battle planes five months ahead of schedule.

Mr. FALL. I have reference to the present troop movement, and that, with 800,000 men, as announced by the Chief of Staff, on the water or in Europe, we are five months ahead of our plan. It struck me at once, then, than the Secretary of War must be five months behind the times, and I should like, so far as I am personally concerned, for him to catch up before he seeks to advise me any further.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, to my mind this getting ready in advance is a most serious matter. For one, I am not willing to see these summer months go by without any action being taken by the Congress in regard to it. It does not console me in the least when I hear it stated that it will only take 60 or 90 days after Congress enlarges the age limit to raise the additional troops. Mr. President, those 60 or 90 days may decide the war. Why is it that anyone should hesitate to take every possible precaution now to put into the hands of the President the power to raise as many troops as he desires? Why this hesitation?

The country has been led to believe that there is to be no limit to this Army; this bill contains a provision in effect lifting the limit as to the size of the Army. Does that provision mean what it says, or is it simply declaratory, to arouse enthusiasm, to reassure? The statement of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the effect that the law as at present drafted puts a rigid limit upon the size of the Army can not be controverted. How are we going to square ourselves with the American public if we leave a rigid limitation in the law and say to the people in the next breath that there is no limit to the size of the Army? What is the purpose of that statement?

I took the President of the United States at his word; I rejoiced when in New York he suggested "Why limit the size of the Army?" I rejoiced when he stated that we were going to stand by Russia just as we are standing by France. The American people rejoiced in it. But leaving the draft law as it now stands upon the statute books negatives the whole program in so far as it is related to the utterances of the President and that provision of the bill which says that the Army shall be without limit.

I am not saying that a million or two million or three million men should be called to the colors within a given time; there is nothing in this amendment that compels the Chief of Staff or the Secretary of War to call more men than can be taken care of—not a thing. They need not call any additional men if they do not think them necessary; but who can say what will happen in the month of October, the month of November, or the month of December? Who can be sure in the assertion that Germany has not planned some other great stroke, and that she may not launch it at a moment's notice? Who can say with absolute certainty that she does not intend eventually to overrun Holland? Are we to stand here and wait until some such emergency overtakes us? We and our allies have indulged in that too much, Senators. This hesitancy in some respects is not surprising, because the people of this country have not been educated to this deadly business of war; but it seems to me we could have learned, and that we have learned by this time, some mighty valuable lessons in this deadly business of war. The greatest lesson of all is to anticipate any and every conceivable blow that your enemy may launch against you. That is why I contend here and now that provision should be made in the statute whereby the President can in effect create an army without limit, for if we do not, Mr. President, we are taking very grave chances, chances that we have no right to take.

It is not the duty of the Congress to say how an army shall be used or where, though individual Senators may express their views, as I attempted to do yesterday in a very brief way. It may not be the duty of Congress, in the judgment of some Senators here, to place a minimum upon the strength of the Army, but it is the duty of the Congress, and it is not the duty of any other branch of the Government, to place in the hands of the President all the men and all the resources of the United States. We are the only ones who can do it; and why his Secretary of War does not want that done passes my comprehension.

Mr. President, I hope that Senators will look upon this amendment of the Senator from New Mexico in the broadest and most statesmanlike spirit. There is nothing of the partisan in it. Senators on both sides realize that no one can tell what will overtake us; Senators on both sides realize that in the past we have failed to anticipate what our enemy might do. If Senators will look upon the amendment in that spirit, I believe they will vote to increase these age limits in the draft, and so make it possible for the Republic to create and maintain at the earliest possible date an army fully able at any time and at any place to cope with our enemy and to overcome him.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I suppose the debate is drawing to a close on this question, and I am glad of it. I do not propose to defer that desirable moment very long, but there are one or two observations I wish to make about this matter before the vote is taken.

I have been impressed with the strength of the argument made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. It is all right to thunder in the title if you do not fail in the substance; but to speak of raising an army without limit, and to provide no additional sources from which that army may come above those you already have, is rather a contradiction in terms.

Mr. President, when the question of policy was before this Congress, I did not favor conscription or forced military service outside of this country as a policy. I am not going to undertake to repeat to the Senate or to the country the reasons which were good and sufficient to my mind then, and are so yet for that view and that position, because the water that is passed turns no wheel. It has become the settled policy of the country, for this war at least, no matter whether some of us desired it to become so or not, so the question left is, the policy of the country being determined, how ought that policy to be executed?

I think now, as I thought in May, 1917, that if military service is to be forced in this country upon its citizens there ought to be equality in bearing that burden between all men of military age. I can see, speaking for myself at least, neither justice nor equity, neither fairness nor right, in the proposition that a young married man without means, it may be, or with but very little means, of 28 years, we will say for the purposes of illustration, with a growing family of little children looking to him for support and guidance and education and protection, should be forced to go to the colors before some lusty bachelor of 32 or 35 or even 40 years of age is summoned to do his bit otherwise than with his tongue. So if enforced military service is to be obligatory upon the manhood of this country it ought to be imposed equally in order that the largest possible number of shoulders will bear the burden.

Besides, the higher you raise the age limit the more opportunity you give for real discrimination in making the exemptions. If you are to be held down to just a few years—between 21 and 28, or between 21 and 31—you will have to be combing your second and third and fourth classes in order to increase your first class if you have got to increase the size of your Army; but if you start at 21 and end at 40, or even at 45—which I think is better—then you will not have to take quite so soon the married men, who are needed to support, protect, and educate their families; you will not have to remove from the vital industries of this country quite so quickly the men who are needed to operate those industries if this country is to continue to function and is to be able to prosecute this war vigorously, adequately, and successfully.

For one, I shall be unable to vote for any proposition, except in defense of the soil of this country, to require military service from boys before they reach the age of 21. Before they arrive at the age fixed by law for manhood's responsibilities and manhood's rights, I do not feel as though we ought to force or exact from them manhood's duties. Many of them will volunteer; many of the boys of 17 or 18 or 19 years of age have already done so; but I do not think they ought to be drafted until they reach the age of 21. So I shall propose to amend the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico as to the age limit to begin at 21, instead of at 20. If my amendment shall prevail, I shall then support the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, there is another reason why the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico ought to prevail, which was alluded to briefly in passing by the Senator from New York, and I think reiterated somewhat by the Senator from New Mexico; but I want to state it again, although I doubt my ability to add strength to the statement of the proposition that has already been made by those Senators.

Under the original draft law, if it had been strictly construed, and, I think, reasonably construed, the size of the Army would have been sharply limited. The President was authorized to do four things: First, to recruit the Regular Army by drafting up to the strength authorized by law; second, to recruit the National Guard up to the strength authorized by law; third, to draft 1,000,000 men in complements of 500,000 each; and, fourth—and here is where the construction has come in—> to raise by draft, organize, equip, and officer, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, in addition to and for each of the above forces, such recruit training units as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at the maximum strength.

Now, by a somewhat liberal construction of the law, by somewhat of a stretching of the law, of which I am not inclined to be critical under the circumstances, the Provost Marshal General's office has construed that to authorize the War Department, so I am informed, to provide these additional units before the existing units are depleted, as Congress evidently contemplated, by the ravages of war. In that way they have been able to add somewhat to the mathematical strength of the Army fixed by the positive mandate of the Congress. But when we were raising an army that we thought meant at the outside a million and a half men, a million for the drafted army and 500,000 men to fill up the ranks of the Regular Army and the National Guard, we fixed an age limit of from 21 to 31, inclusive, out of which to raise that number of men. Now, if the President is to be given unlimited power to raise an unlimited number of men, then the burden ought not to be borne by any such narrow class. The burden becomes infinitely greater, infinitely heavier, and ought to be borne by the entire manhood of this country.

Mr. President, one other observation, and then I shall detain the Senate no longer, though it is almost useless, or it seems so, so far as the present is concerned, to make it; and yet I warn you, Mr. President, it will bear fruit, and that in the not far distant future. The Constitution of the country, sneered at, disregarded, despised, abused, and evaded, provides that "the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies." That power resides not in the President of the United States nor in the War Department nor in the Chief of Staff nor in anyone else on this earth except the Congress of the United States. I would not under any consideration have Congress interfere with the operation of armies after they are raised, for the operation of armies is a military matter, an executive function, and we would be ridiculous if we had a board of strategy composed of 435 Members of the other House and 96 Members of the Senate to direct our military operations; but when it comes to the raising of armies, that is an entirely different question; it is one which by the Constitution of our country is remitted to the body of which this House is one component part, and which power this body, in my judgment, can not delegate to anybody else on earth.

This war was declared by the Congress of the country; it is the country's war, not the Executive's war; it is the country's conflict, and not any one man's conflict; and I would not confer on any one man born of woman—Democrat or Republican, President or what not—the right to say how large an army should be raised or how small, whether all the manhood of this country should be sent or not one. If this is to remain a democracy, if this is to continue the land of the free, that power belongs to the representatives of the people, and to them alone; and if liberty is to live in the Republic, that power can not be surrendered to any person or official whatsoever, and it ought not to be surrendered. The Congress ought to determine for itself, after full investigation, how much of an army is needed, can be equipped, and should be raised.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, when we entered this war my view is that there were comparatively few men in the United States who fully realized the important duty that this Nation had to fulfill before the war was closed. The Russian armies were still in the field; our allies were holding the western front without a break. It seemed to me, and I think to most of the American people, that if we sent an army to Europe of a half million or a million men and mobilized our industries at that time in favor of the allied cause the war would be over in the first year, with victory crowning our arms and our cause. But that viewpoint has gone astray. The collapse of the Russian Government and the withdrawal of the German armies from the eastern front have entirely changed the situation, and, in my judgment, to-day there is but one way to win this war conclusively and that is to put every ounce of weight of our great country in the allied cause, and do it as quickly as possible. It is both the wise thing to do and the economical thing to do, both from the standpoint of men and of money. It will cost us far less in loss of life and far less in the expenditure of dollars if we can bring this war to a successful close at the end of this year by breaking down the German columns and writing a treaty of peace at the point of the sword before the snow flies than it will if this war drags out through a period of two, three, or four years. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am heartily in favor of using every power in this Government this year and this hour that can be availed of to bring the war to a successful termination at the earliest possible moment. I think that is the viewpoint of every man in this Chamber to-day.

Now, looking at it from that standpoint, the question that confronts us is as to whether or not we will accomplish something toward that end by the adoption of the pending amendment at this time. If it will accomplish that result, it will have my vote most cheerfully; if it will not accomplish that result, I am not prepared to do an unnecessary thing.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I am in thorough accord with the provision that is already written in this bill, to allow the President of the United States to raise an army without limit. The greater the army that it is possible for him to raise and put in the field the sooner we can bring this war to a successful conclusion. That power is granted. The only thing involved in this amendment is the question as to whether the reservoir from which this army is to be drawn is large enough to meet the demands of the hour and to build up the Army to the size that the President of the United States thinks he is capable of bringing into the field at this time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator states that there is a provision in this bill which allows the increasing of the Army without limit. I wish to ask the Senator if the power to raise the Army is not limited all the way through by specific appropriations for specific purposes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was coming to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. And does not the report of the committee itself, which declares that the bill will take care of approximately 3,000,000 men, preclude the raising of an army of 5,000,000 men?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is foreclosing my speech by asking his question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am sorry.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I am in accord with the suggestion the Senator makes, and that is the point to which I am coming.

We have given to the President—or will give under this bill if it becomes a law—the power without limit, within the terms of the draft act, to call to the standard every man that he desires. If the President of the United States or the Secretary of War will come before Congress or officially send word to Congress that there are not sufficient men in the present draft ages to carry on the plans of the Government, then I am willing to increase the number of men from which he can draw to such limit as the executive branch of the Government is willing to suggest; and I think that is strictly a function of the executive branch of the Government. The Congress declares the great principles of the Nation; we announce the principles upon which the Government must rest; we have announced the great principles for the carrying on of this war; but when it comes to the details, Congress can not provide the details and can not carry them out. That is strictly an executive function, and we must let it rest there, and we propose to do it under the terms of this bill.

I understand that up to this time the President has not asked that the draft limit be increased, nor has his Secretary of War suggested that we should do so. My understanding is that we have in the neighborhood of 2,000,000 men under arms in France and in this country, and that under the draft act we have a reservoir in class 1 of something over 1,600,000 yet to draw from. In other words, we are able as the law stands now, and as the draft is apportioned, to nearly double the Army that we now have in the field.

Now, Mr. President, after the President of the United States has announced that he does not want any limitation placed on the size of the army that he can raise, and after it has been demonstrated month after month, in the recent months that have gone by, that he is carrying every available man to the firing line of France that it is possible for him to carry there, I take it that the executive branch of this Government is prepared to raise just as large an army as conditions will allow, and throw it against the German columns to crush them down. Therefore, that being the natural inference from the situation that presents itself to us, I take it that when the President of the United States does not ask us to increase the draft ages he is not prepared to utilize the men that he would get by reason of the increase of the draft ages.

To build an army requires two things. There are two sides to it. There is the personnel, which is composed of the men we draft and send to the ranks. There is the matériel, which means clothes, small arms, cannon, ships, food, and equipment of every kind. There is no question whatever that we have at least 1,600,000 men that could be called to the standards to-morrow. Why are they not called? We need them if we can get them. There is no question as to the attitude of the Executive on this question. Why are they not called? There can be but one answer to the question, and that is that at this hour the Nation is not prepared to respond to furnish the matériel equal to the amount of men that it can furnish for the Army, and that is the limitation.

My understanding is that this bill carries appropriations to equip, army, and maintain an army of 3,000,000 men. I have no doubt in my mind that if the Nation were prepared to do so from the matériel standpoint, the chairman of the committee would have brought in appropriations not to arm, maintain, and equip 3,000,000 men, but to arm, maintain, and equip 5,000,000 men. I take it, and I think it goes without controversy, that the reason why it is not done is because we have not the guns, the clothes, the food, and the ships to take care of that many men at this hour.

Now, the Nation is mobilizing. Six months from now we probably will be able to take care of the additional men in class 1 in the draft age, but it is not so to-day. If it is not true to-day, what would we accomplish in increasing the draft age to-day? What would be worked out for the good of the Nation? Why should we say in this law that the boys between 18 and 21 must register and become a part of the drafted army to-day, or that the men between 31 and 40 must become a part of the drafted army to-day if we can not use them? I see nothing that can be accomplished by that result at present; and, on the other hand, I recognize the fact that to-day it is a very different proposition than it was a year ago to bring men within the terms of the draft. We have the machinery organized. The country is ready to respond. Men know what the law is, and the machinery of the Government is ready to put it into force. When we increased the age limit and brought into the draft the boys who had become 21 in the last year it did not cause any disruption in the country. There were no great difficulties involved, so far as the executive branch of the Government was concerned. It merely required the enactment of the law. The machinery moved along smoothly, and in one day practically every man who had become 21 years of age within a year was within the draft. The question of fixing his exact place and assembling and deciding on his status in the various classes in the draft is only a question of weeks to determine, not of months. So that at any time in the future when it becomes apparent that the reservoir from which we must draw our reserves has become exhausted and is not keeping up with the matériel that we can supply them with to make the Army, it is merely a matter of a few hours in the Congress of the United States to pass the necessary resolution, and only a question of a few weeks to classify these men and place them in their natural place in the draft, and I am prepared to do it.

I do not intend to vote for this amendment at this time, for the reasons I have expressed; but at any hour that the executive branch of the Government says that there are not enough men enrolled under the present draft system to supply the Army that we need in Europe, I am prepared to vote immediately for an increase of the draft and an extension of the age limits. Up to that time, however, I do not see how anything can be accomplished by it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it a fact that class 1 of the draft will be exhausted within the next 60 days?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Minnesota asks me a question that is a technical question. I am not a member of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate and I have not the exact information, and therefore I hesitate to answer his question; but I will say that, so far as the information I have is concerned, that condition does not exist. I will tell the Senator why it does not exist. My understanding is that there are over 1,600,000 men in that class. They can not be inducted into the Army in that time. Of course, an order could put them in, but I do not think there are going to be any more orders made to send them to camp until the clothes are there and the food is there and the guns are there. It would be folly to do so.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just let me finish my sentence. Now, I think the answer to the Senator's question is conclusive. The answer sits in this Chamber. The chairman of the Military Affairs Committee has reported a bill providing for 3,000,000 men, and I take it that the bill he has reported meets with the approval of the executive department of the Government. Now, he does not advise supplying the money to arm, equip, and maintain 3,000,000 men. He has 2,000,000 men. To carry out the terms of the bill he needs 1,000,000 men more. When he has drawn them from the reservoir of men, he still has 600,000 men left within class 1.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not think there ought to be any misunderstanding of the facts. The facts are that if the authorities continue to call men as they have called them—and they expect to continue to call them as they have called them—by the 15th day of September all of class 1 will be in the military camps.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not dispute the Senator's figures on that point at all.

Mr. REED. I state that on the authority of the statement which was made by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff this morning, that that is in fact the expectation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure, if we intend to call men at the rate of 500,000 per month, we will exhaust 1,600,000 men in three months. That is mere mathematics. But the proposition I make is this: I take it that this bill has been written on the estimates of the War Department, and I take it that in the main the estimates of the War Department have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that it is the view of the Secretary that within the next 60 days additional estimates will be made of additional expense incident to a broadening of the draft and to calling additional men; but up to the present time the appropriation does not go beyond those now within class 1, and is less than those within class 1. I mention that to the Senator because I was at the hearing this morning when the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff appeared, and I mention it to confirm the view which the Senator is presenting.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Exactly. Now, there is the proposition. The War Department can not go beyond this appropriation at this time in bringing the men into the camps. If it is prepared within the next few months to purchase the arms, to get the guns, to provide the clothing and the food, I have no doubt in the world that it will come before the Congress before the 1st of September and ask for additional appropriations for an increase in the size of the Army above what is carried in this bill. When that comes, going hand in hand with it, it is a simple matter to write within that new appropriation the increase in the draft age, and I shall cheerfully support it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama further yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say to the Senator that the Secretary of War said that at that time he desired also to ask us to broaden the draft age, and he felt that it was wiser to move along the entire line at the same time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was not present when that information was given. It is the first time I have heard it, but I am glad to hear it, and I wish to say that my views are in accord with that statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wished to let the Senator know, while he was presenting almost the exact reasons that the Secretary of War submitted to us, that they were the reasons given us by the Secretary of War.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In my judgment they are conclusive reasons why no change should be made in this bill, and why we should wait until additional money is wanted, and an additional army is provided for, to increase the age limits.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. What objection could there be to expressing in this bill the legislative judgment that the Army should be increased to 5,000,000 as rapidly as equipment and transportation should be provided? What is the objection to saying that to the country, saying that to our allies, and preparing to meet it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the first place, I will say to the Senator that I think we are too much given to expressing our legislative judgment. I do not believe in expressing our judgment about things that are not our business. I believe in action along the lines that are confined within the legislative duties of Congress. But, more than that, there is a complete answer to the Senator's question, so far as Congress is concerned, contained within the pages of this bill. This bill authorizes the President of the United States to make the Army as large as he wants to. The only limitation on that power is the appropriations carried in this bill, and those appropriations conform to the wishes of the executive branch of the Government. So that we have already told the American people that we are going to the limit in this bill, but we are only appropriating the money that we can use to-day; and I do not think there is a man between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans at this good hour who doubts for a moment that the Congress of the United States is going to furnish all the money and all the supplies to maintain the largest army that it is possible for the executive branch of the Government to put in the field.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator gave as his first answer that he was opposed to Congress expressing its legislative judgment on a matter which was not the business of Congress. Is it not the business of Congress, in raising an army, to determine the size of that army——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have done that.

Mr. McCUMBER. And what the conditions of the war demand of this country?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is not that a legislative matter?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then is it not our business?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the Senator wanted to go beyond our business. We have done that. If the Senator had confined himself to our business, I would agree to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Our business is to say how large the Army shall be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely; and we have said that. We have said that it should be an army without limit, and we could not say more; but when the time comes to say how many men shall go to the standards this month, and the next month, and the month after, that is the business of the executive branch of the Government; and I am in favor of leaving that business in the hands of the Executive without advice from the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me once more, I do not think that is exactly what we have said. Taking the entire bill, it says that we appropriate so many dollars for certain purposes, and that means raising an army of approximately 3,000,000 men. Therefore, no matter what suggestion there may be in the bill itself, the bill itself provides for raising an army of approximately 3,000,000 men and not any more—not an unlimited number.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure; and the Senator is right on the crux of the question. In this bill we have given authority to the President to raise all the men he can; but the Senator points out that he can not raise more men than he has money to supply, and there is the limitation. Now, I ask the Senator, if you want to cut off that limitation, how are you going to do it? Not by passing a resolution through Congress expressing our views on what should be done. That does not get anywhere. That may interfere with the Executive's control of his own business, but it does not get us or the Nation anywhere. If you are not satisfied that 3,000,000 men should be taken care of now, there is only one practical way to meet that question, and that is to decrease these appropriations. If you think it ought to be 6,000,000 men instead of 3,000,000, then you ought to double these appropriations. But I am sure the Senator would never agree to propose an amendment to this bill doubling every appropriation in it when the executive branch of the Government had not asked for more money than is provided for within the terms of the bill.

Mr. FALL and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield; yes.

Mr. FALL. Is it not fair, then, to ask why you have worded the amendment to the draft act as it has been worded? If the committee thought it necessary to increase the power of the President, and to give him further authority, why did not the committee recommend additional appropriations to carry out the purpose?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not a member of the committee, but I think it goes without saying that the committee has not recommended additional appropriations, because the executive branch of the Government is not prepared at this moment to use them.

Mr. FALL. Then, of course, it is apparent that the purpose is not to increase the Army beyond the number already provided for.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At this time; but the Senator from Georgia has just said that the Chief of Staff has stated to the Committee on Military Affairs that within a few months he intends to ask for additional appropriations, and to ask for a change in the draft.

Mr. FALL. Then no change at all in the law is necessary at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When you have 2,000,000 men in the field, and have provided for an army of 3,000,000 men, it goes without saying that you are only going to call a million men, and you have a reservoir of 1,600,000 men to draw from. That is plain mathematics. That is all there is in that.

Mr. FALL. Why, certainly; it is purely a question of mathematics. It is perfectly apparent, then, that there is really no intention to give the President, or no necessity of giving him, any additional authority at all, and that therefore my remark a while ago, using the hackneyed term "camouflage," was perfectly appropriate—that this provision here is pure camouflage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not agree with the Senator about that at all. I think it is the desire and wish of the President to put as large an army in the field as it is possible and practicable for him to do.

Mr. FALL. Exactly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I think he is going on to do it.

Mr. FALL. But the Senator says his power is limited by the appropriation in this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. FALL. And the appropriation does not provide for any increase.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely; it is limited at this hour by the appropriation in this bill, as every other limitation comes in; but that does not limit us next week or next year, when they are prepared to go on.

Mr. FALL. Certainly not. Then, when you come next week or next year to the additional appropriation to enable you to go on, why do you not wait and then come on with the power to raise additional men?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I believe in. I am not opposing the Senator's amendment as a fundamental proposition. I do not know whether or not he was in the Chamber when I started my remarks, but I said that I am perfectly willing to vote for an amendment of this kind whenever the Executive will say that he needs more men than are in the present reservoir.

Mr. FALL. Precisely. Now, here is the position of the Senator from New Mexico: Here is an amendment, which might be subject to a point of order, upon this bill. That question I am not passing upon; but it is offered by the committee and reads as follows:

That the authority conferred upon the President by the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," is hereby extended so as to authorize him during each fiscal year to raise by draft, as provided in said act and acts amendatory thereof, the maximum number of men which may be organized, equipped, trained, and used during such year for the prosecution of the present war until the same shall have been brought to a successful conclusion.

This is the amendment as proposed by the committee, increasing the authority of the President, because under the original draft act the President could raise the first 500,000 men of the National Army, the second 500,000 men, and there his authority stopped, except that he could also raise or provide for certain skeleton recruit units.

This proposed amendment simply does away with that restriction as to the million men and the recruit units, and leaves him to raise under the present registration all the men he can raise, irrespective of the number as restricted in the original act. Now, according to the Senator's argument, there is apparently no provision made by the committee for carrying out the provisions of this act in the matter of increased appropriations. If that is so, then this provision is useless, and logically it should be stricken out.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator's point of view is not mine at all. In the first place, we knew we were going to raise more than a million men last year. We did not provide for more than a million men at that time in our original appropriation. We believe we are going to raise more than 1,600,000 men now, but in the hour and time we have to get the matériel with which to equip the Army. I do not know, and I do not suppose the Senator knows, what is available in the country to-day in the way of guns, cannon, clothes, and food to take care of this Army. I assume that the Senator in charge of the bill, following out the desires of the War Department, has gone to the limit for this hour; but I know, and the Senator knows, that we are expanding our industrial army every hour and that what we can do to-day is no limitation on what we can do to-morrow; and more than that, if we did not increase the age limit at all and concluded that we wanted to put 5,000,000 men in the field—that is, 3,000,000 men in addition to what we have now—we could get those men under the present draft law if we invaded the deferred classifications.

Mr. FALL. Yes; if we should take agricultural laborers and men having dependents.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. So that the proposition is not directly involved in this bill, because we are only going to draw 1,000,000 men out of the reservoir of class 1, with 1,600,000 in it.

Mr. FALL. Altogether.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the policy of the Senator from New Mexico and myself would not be at variance——

Mr. FALL. I do not think it would.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The question that if we want to go outside, if we require more men than the 1,600,000 men in the reservoir of class 1, instead of invading the deferred classifications where we find the industrial army of America, we had better increase the age limits, and not invade that field, is not a question that it is necessary for us to consider at this moment, because we are preparing to take care of the situation in this hour so far as the limitations of this bill permit us to take care of it.

Mr. FALL. That is exactly the point. I do not think the Senator has caught my point in saying it is not necessary to go beyond that; and yet you say to the people by this proposition here that you are granting unlimited power to the President. You are restricting the number to 1,600,000, and still you say you do not provide him with the money with which he can do it. You are holding out that hope to the ear of the people to be broken in the performance.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When the Senator looks at the ground his vision is limited to the ground in front of his feet, but when he looks at the horizon his vision goes far beyond his ability to reach it. The difference in these propositions is that, so far as this bill is concerned, we are looking at the ground in front of our feet in our power to do something. When we make our declaration as to what the President ought to do, we are looking at the horizon on which flies the flag of our successful and ultimate victory over the German Nation. There we place our standards to which we are going to march. Under the limitations of this bill we are merely providing for the hour, for the men to be equipped and put in the field, and in the declaration we give to the President unlimited power. We say the point we are going to is to win the war, and that is a very different proposition.

Mr. FALL. Let us look at the horizon the Senator refers to. When we say we are going to give to the President unlimited power, then, as I understand the Senator's illustration, we are looking to the horizon and we are making no preparation in arming the President with power to march toward the horizon where our flag is planted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We are arming him with power. We do not propose it by our appropriations of the hour, we are not passing it in this bill; but there is a bill in the committee of the Senate to-day providing for great guns and artillery to conduct the war, carrying an appropriation of $5,000,000,000. It is to take care of a situation with an army three times as big as the one we have in the field to-day. But we do not expect to spend it all in one hour, and we could not spend it all this year. As a matter of fact, a part of that bill is cash appropriation, and a part of it is an authorization which is to extend beyond the limits of the fiscal year.

Mr. FALL. I do not care to interrupt the Senator in his very interesting speech, but I have been very much interested in ascertaining just how far apart we are. If the Senator means what he says, while he is limiting the power of the President by appropriations he is attempting to increase the power of the President or to confer additional power on the President by this bill, showing the President the horizon toward which to march, although he is tying his feet together, so that he can not proceed in that direction.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. FALL. While we are doing that, the Senator agrees with me that it is better to increase the age limit rather than to take necessary agricultural labor, on the one hand, or those with dependents, on the other. While we agree upon that, still the Senator does not agree that this is the time to do it as a portion of the program looking toward our march toward the horizon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I certainly do not. There is no difference in substance, in my judgment, between the position of the Senator from New Mexico and myself as to the substance and the ultimate goal to go to. There is a technical difference as to when the hour comes when it is necessary for us to do this act. I say the hour has not come on this bill. No man can demonstrate that it is here on this bill. We have more in the reservoir than we need. I expect within three months more money will be needed and asked for, and then we can determine how far it is necessary to extend the age limit to replete the reservoir of men whom we need to accomplish our ultimate result. That will be time enough.

Mr. FALL. Then there is no difference except this: The Senator thinks it is necessary to adopt the provision which I have read increasing the power of the President; he will not be willing to see the President use this power by drawing additional forces from the agricultural labor or those having dependents, but he would agree that we should increase this power by drawing from the classes I have named.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will tell the Senator why I think it is better to put it off. I have a reason why. I think it will have to be extended ultimately before we get through with the war. I do not think it is necessary to do it now, because we could not do it; we have not the appropriations provided to do it.

Mr. FALL. Then the Senator understands me. My contention is if it is not necessary to do that now it is not necessary to adopt this provision.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is necessary to increase the President's power, because he has already gone to the limit of his power. We are going beyond the limit of the Army. We must give him additional power, and in giving him additional power we might say, "We will allow you to raise a million men more," or we might say, "You can raise 5,000,000 men more," or we can say, and probably we have said, in this bill, "Go on and raise as many men as you can to win the war with." That is all; but you can not stop with the present limitation, because you could not increase the Army at all if you did.

Mr. President, the one reason why I think it is the part of wisdom to defer action on this question of changing the age limit at this time is this: The country is going into harvest time. The industries are being mobilized to their utmost capacity. Men are human, no matter how brave and patriotic they may be. There is no more disturbed man in the armies of the United States than the man whom you have just called to the draft, and necessarily so. The future is unknown to him. An unknown life stares him in the face. The home surroundings and the home life must be broken and separated from. Every fiber of his body, every drop of his blood, every beat of his heart is affected by the summons that comes to him, not that he is not a courageous man, not that he is not willing to do his full duty to his country, not that he is not glad to respond to his country's call, but in that hour of doubt as to his future you upset the entire mental and effective capacity of the man.

Mr. FALL rose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, just one moment, and I will yield. He is in more mental distress than the man who is in the front line in the trenches in France, who has found his place and is ready to go on. The man in France is already separated from his family; he has already decided the question of life and business; he has but one business before him, and that is victory. Now, in this hour, when the Nation's crop must be planted and gathered, when the Nation's industrial resources must be maintained, are you willing to pass a law that may not be necessary for three months and bring to the home of every man between 18 and 21 and between 31 and 40 this entire change of life? He may think to-day it is something that may occur in the future; even men up to 50 may think the hour may come when they will be summoned to their country's needs; but it is not at his door to-day, and why should we place it at his door when we can just as effectively and just as successfully, for the cause of the Nation, accomplish the result and bring it to the man when we need him, and not before? I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, of course there is great strength in the Senator's argument, and I was simply asking him to apply it to present conditions. Under this bill, what are you doing? Under the former bill, and the rules and regulations adopted under it, you classified all the men between 21 and 31, and said, "Class 1, you will be subject to immediate call; class 2, class 3, class 4, class 5, you will be deferred." These men are working on farms, they are working in their different business enterprises, with the understanding that before they would be called the men would be called who are subject to classification in class 1; that is, those with no dependents and whose work was not necessary for the carrying on of war industries. All these men, millions of them—6,000,000 men—have been practically informed that they could go about their business until they were reached in turn in their classes. The passage of this law, then tells every one of them, without increasing class 1, without calling further upon the youth of the country, those without dependents or not occupied in agricultural pursuits, and without proceeding to call them as we have been calling them, and continuing to excuse them as we have been excusing them, "Hold yourselves now in readiness, because we have given the President the power to call any of you or all of you to-morrow."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not wish to reach my conclusion in that way. When we give the President the right to call men there is a limitation on it. Of course, there is first the limitation of the draft age, the registration next, the limitation of the supplies necessary to furnish an army; but when we give the President the unlimited power to raise an army we notify every man in the country who is able to bear arms, whether he be 60 or whether he be 18, that if his country needs him on the battle line he must go. That is a summons to every man, whether he is in the draft age or not. Now, within the draft age there is no disturbance, because the very terms of the act carry on its face what we are going to do. We have a reservoir in class 1 of 1,600,000 men. We are providing by appropriations in the terms of this bill to increase the Army 1,000,000 men, and every man within the draft age knows that there are going to be 600,000 men left in class 1 when the terms of the bill are carried out, and that we can not go beyond that until there is additional legislation in the way of appropriations, and when that additional legislation in the way of appropriations comes we will take care of increasing the age limit in the draft.

Mr. FALL. I am absolutely astounded at the statement made by the Senator, that after raising the additional million men under the terms of this bill there would still be left 600,000 men in class 1. That is contrary to all the evidence that I have seen that has been given before any committee or any statement made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a statement from members of the Military Committee that we have about 2,000,000 men in the field. Does the Senator controvert that?

Mr. FALL. No.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Left in the draft age to-day in class 1 there are 1,600,000.

Mr. FALL. I controvert that and would like to have the figures.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I got the information about the 1,600,000 from members of the Military Affairs Committee. But that is neither here nor there. Whether the number is 1,600,000 or 1,450,000 my argument is the same.

Mr. FALL. Reading from the RECORD, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] stated yesterday—and I think other Senators are prepared to affirm his statement—that we will have used all our men by the 15th of September and that there are now remaining approximately about 640,000 men. I ask the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who is on the committee and is familiar with the figures, if that is not correct?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We did discuss that on this side of the Chamber a moment ago. If they continue to draw the draft at the rate of 500,000 men a month, they will have exhausted class 1. But this bill does not provide for that. It provides for 3,000,000 men.

The Senator admits that there are 2,000,000 men in the Army. We have 3,000,000 men, and it will require 1,000,000 men more. It is immaterial, so far as my argument is concerned, whether the reservoir holds to-day 1,600,000 or whether it holds 1,450,000; at any rate the reservoir holds more than the demands of this particular bill are going to make on that reservoir in class 1.

Mr. FALL. Then this particular bill does not give unlimited power to the President to raise an army?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; this bill is built upon the ground under our feet. It is the action of the hour. The provision in the bill as to the unlimited power of the President goes to the horizon of our Nation's endeavor in this great struggle.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, simply in the interest of accuracy——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will be glad to have the Senator correct my figures. As I said in the beginning, I am not on the Military Committee, and I did not have the accurate information.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Let me state the figures that have been given to us this morning, and if there be any error in what I state I ask that immediately I be corrected. After the present quota that is now called for and is in progress of being filled, there will remain, in class 1, 640,000 men.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely, but that does not controvert what I have said.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; not at all. Outside of the present quota that is now being provided for there are in the Army 2,000,000 men.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I understood the Senator to say that there were 1,600,000 men now in class 1. In that he is in error.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator's answer to me is technical. There is no real dispute between us. I am making my calculation upon the basis that there are 2,000,000 men in the Army to-day. All outside of that I count in the draft, whether they have been called or not called, and although a number of them have been called, they have not been inducted into the Army. It is a mere question of time. Outside of this call, and this call is still in the draft, there are 2,000,000 men in the Army. Now, taking that as a basis, and not counting in the Army, but counting in the draft, the men within the present call, you have 1,400,000 men. So the last statement shows.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; the Senator is in error in that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the Senator maintain that with the men we have in the Army with the uniform on and the men who are either in the call or in the draft we have not enough to make an army of 3,000,000 men?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; I am not contending anything of the sort.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then there is no controversy between us. It is a mere question of words; that is all.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator from Alabama is quite correct in saying that the bill which is now under consideration contemplates an army of 3,000,000 men, but he is quite incorrect in saying that in the draft at present there are 1,600,000 men. The present quota that is now being filled—the number could be stated, but I take it it is unnecessary—is in process of consummation. After that shall have been completed there will be 640,000 men left in class 1.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, let me ask the Senator when that quota shall be completed how many men will there be in the Army?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I give those figures accurately?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There has been a good deal of dispute about it, and the Senator from California has stated it approximately correct:

The number of fighting men remaining in class 1 on August 1, 1918, 277,359.

Estimate of fighting men in class 1 to be obtained from June 5, 1918, registration, 400,000.

Estimate of fighting men in class 1 to be obtained from rectification of classification, work or fight order, decision of pending cases, and other miscellaneous sources, 200,000.

Total number estimated to be available after July calls are filled, 877,359.

This number will be depleted by Navy and marine enlistments, deaths, and so forth.

The estimated calls for 1918 are as follows:

August calls	300,000
September calls	150,000
October calls	150,000
November calls	150,000
December calls	125,000
Making a total of	875,000

Mr. UNDERWOOD. While the Senator is on his feet let me ask him a question. As I stated in the beginning, I am not a member of the committee and I got my information from members of the committee as to the number of men we need. As I understand it, and I hope the Senator will correct me if I am in error, this bill provides for the arming and equipping and the maintenance of an army of 3,000,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Practically 3,000,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the limitation on it. Now, I want to ask the Senator this question: When you have in the Army, including those who are in and those whom you are calling for, 3,000,000 men, the number that are required under the terms of this bill, how many will you have left of class 1 drafted?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I question if we shall have any, unless there be added to class 1 men who are drafted under the treaties which have been negotiated. In other words, this would practically exhaust class 1.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In just one minute. Is the chairman of the committee supporting this proposal?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To amend the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To amend the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Personally I feel disposed to support it; I have always felt that the draft age ought to be modified; but after the statements made by the Chief of Staff this morning and by the Secretary of War. I think we ought to let the matter remain in statu quo until Congress convenes after the recess.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then you think that within class 1 of the draft age there are sufficient men to fill up the Army to the extent that you have provided for in this bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I think so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is all there is in the argument.

Mr. FALL. May I ask the Senator from Oregon a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I will ask, if I may, of the chairman, Is it true that while holding out to the people of the United States that there is unlimited power vested in the President of the United States to raise an unlimited number of men, merely as his judgment may dictate, as a matter of fact it will require further action of Congress before he can raise more than 3,000,000, including those now in the service?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is correct, unless the President goes ahead and calls a large number of men, taking them from classes 2, 3, 4, and 5, and creating a deficiency.

Mr. FALL. Creating a deficiency; but so far as Congress is now providing, instead of giving the President unlimited authority to enable him to call out all men who may be necessary in any crisis when Congress adjourns or recesses or is not here you are limiting and restricting him by the terms of this bill, as I said this morning, so that he can not call more than 3,000,000 men without going beyond any provision of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In order to do it he would have to create a deficiency, because this bill only provides for arming, equipping, and training about 3,000,000 men.

Mr. FALL. And under the plan we are proceeding to draft these men irrespective of any provision in this bill; that is, the additional men?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They could go into class 2.

Mr. FALL. But I say under the present program now being carried out they are proceeding to draft without reference to the additional men in class 1.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are now drafting them.

Mr. FALL. Without reference to this law; and therefore there is nothing gained by vesting additional power in the President in this law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question. As I understood the figures which the chairman just read in the number of men who are proposed to be drawn by the department for the ensuing months up until January next, the aggregate of the various months is just about the number now in class 1. Is that correct?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is just about the same number.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, then, they have ample men for the remaining months of this year according to the figures the chairman just read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say this: The Senator will notice that the estimate of the draft for August, September, October, November, and December gradually falls off; in other words, for the month of August they have estimated that the call will be for 300,000 and for each succeeding month 150,000. Those are only estimates. If they increase those we will not have enough men of class 1 to fill any enlargement in the draft, but taking those estimates as the basis upon which they will act there are enough men in class 1 to fill the requirement.

Mr. McKELLAR. One other question. Those figures include the 196,000 men who have appealed to the various district boards and whose cases have not yet been settled?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It includes all of class 1.

Mr. McKELLAR. There are, I understand, 196,000 cases that have been appealed, out of which they surely ought to get 95 per cent at least. That would be an addition?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It would be an addition.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator from Oregon a question? As I understand it, and I want to know whether the Senator understands it in the same way, in order to raise the number provided for by the appropriation in this bill it will take all in class 1, including what can be taken from the other classification and through a reclassification put into class 1. That is estimated at something like 200,000, and in addition to that there are 150,000 whom they expect to obtain through the recent treaties. Am I not right in that statement?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know that I quite understand the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not figure out how we are going to get out of class 1, 3,000,000 men with the number we have already in the Army unless we take all of the men who are now in class 1, and also an estimate of 200,000 who will be put in class 1 by reclassification and add to that 150,000 whom we expect to raise through the treaties that have been recently negotiated.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have read the estimates of Gen. Crowder, and they embrace only those in class 1.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the figures the Senator read included a reclassification, taking from the present classification some 200,000 men and putting them in class 1.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. About 200,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It includes those?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. Does it also include the number of men we intend to draft in the Army under the provisions of the treaties?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It does not include them.

Mr. SMOOT. Then my figures and the Senator's wholly differ. The only way I can make 3,000,000 men is by adding about 150,000 whom we expect to get into the Army under the treaties recently negotiated.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I gave notice this morning that I would call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill. If the Senator from Oregon will yield to me for that purpose I will be glad to call up that report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In reply to the Senator I will state that there are two or three Senators who desire to address the Senate on the pending amendment. I believe there is another conference report, the report on the Post Office appropriation bill, to come up. I therefore ask that the unfinished business be laid aside until the Senate convenes to-morrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN subsequently said:

Mr. President, there is a provision in the Army appropriation bill which has reference to the credits that are allowed to the several States. There has been some question as to the fairness of the law or as to the effect of this provision and one which was based upon population. I have had the Provost Marshal General prepare a comparative tabulated statement showing the quota under the present law and the quota under the law which is based on population. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Statement showing a comparison of the States of California and Louisiana.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. TILLMAN. I call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 10854) submitted by me earlier in the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The Secretary read the report, which appears earlier in today's proceedings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments still in disagreement, request a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE, conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to call up the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the report, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment numbered 23 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amendment proposed by the Senate and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices $665,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to extend existing contracts for pneumatic-tube service until March 4, 1919, and the Postmaster General is directed to expend this appropriation for the sole purpose of continuing the existing pneumatic mail tube service, and no part thereof shall be expended for the transportation of mails in any other manner than herein authorized: Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report to Congress not later than the 1st day of December, 1918, (1) whether or not the present pneumatic mail tube service in the cities of New York, N. Y., Brooklyn, N. Y., Boston, Mass., Philadelphia, Pa., Chicago, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo., is a valuable and efficient postal facility, whether or not it expedites the delivery of first-class mail and should be retained or discontinued; (2) to investigate and report whether or not the present pneumatic-tube mail system is suited for the purpose of expediting the delivery of first-class mail, or whether tubes of a different kind or size should be employed; (3) if the said commission should recommend the retention of the present system, should the properties be purchased or leased by the Government, and at what price and upon what terms; (4) if said commission should recommend a rental, as at present operated, what compensation should be paid therefor: Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall permit hearings to all parties at interest and the expenses for such investigation shall be paid out of any available funds appropriated for the use of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

And the House agree to the same.

J. H. BANKHEAD,
THOMAS W. HARDWICK,
CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WILLIAM M. BELL,
HALVOR STEENERSON,
MARTIN B. MADDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

We do not concur in the above report.

JOHN A. MOON,
A. B. ROUSE,
Of the Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement in reference to the report.

The Senate will remember that several days ago the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill was adopted with one item still in dispute, being what is commonly called the pneumatic-tube item. The conferees upon the bill have agreed upon that item, and I have submitted the report, which I should like to have adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. POMERENE. I present a report (No. 525) from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the memorial of William E. Chilton in the matter of the election to the Senate of a Senator from the State of West Virginia, which I ask may be printed. The report is accompanied by a resolution, which I submit and ask that it lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 269), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That HOWARD SUTHERLAND has been elected as Senator from the State of West Virginia for a term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1917, and that he is entitled to a seat in the Senate as such Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to have the resolution considered?

Mr. POMERENE. No. The report should first be printed, and I suggest that it also be printed in the RECORD in order that we can take it up for consideration at an early day, possibly to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the petition and memorial of William E. Chilton to the Senate of the United States in the matter of the election of a United States Senator from the State of West Virginia for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1917, adopted as its report thereon the following report of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and directed that it be respectfully submitted to the Senate, and recommends the adoption of the resolution accompanying said report:

REPORT OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

MAY 15, 1918.

On the 4th day of March, 1917, Hon. William E. Chilton presented to the Senate of the United States a memorial praying for an investigation to determine whether or not Howard Sutherland was duly elected to the office of United States Senator.

The petition seeks to set aside the election of Howard Sutherland as Senator for two reasons, which may be stated in general terms as follows:

First. That Howard Sutherland was not the nominee of the Republican Party for the office of United States Senator, because his nomination was brought about by practices which violate the statutes of West Virginia in that no candidate is permitted to spend at the primary more than $75 for each county in the State; that there are 55 counties in the State, making a maximum amount to be expended $4,125; that the statement of his receipts and expenditures which he filed June 6, 1916, before the primary shows a total expenditure by him of $4,395.69, which is $270.69 in excess of the amount permitted to be spent under the statute; that after the primary, on or about June 20, 1916, he filed another statement, as required by the statute, in which he recites among other things that the sum of $375 was improperly charged to primary campaign expenses in the first account filed, leaving a balance of $4,020.69; that expenses incurred by him after the filing of the first account amounted to $155.94, making the total amount thus expended in the primary campaign $4,176.63, or $51.63 in excess of the maximum permitted by the West Virginia statute; and that, because of these facts, the election should be set aside and his seat declared vacant.

Second. The petitioner further charges that Howard Sutherland's election was brought about by practices which were corrupt and illegal in that hundreds of persons known to be dead or nonresident of Mingo County were placed on the registration books; that an appeal was made to the county courts, under the statute, to hear evidence touching the legality of these registrations, but the court declined to hear the evidence; that said names were allowed to remain on the registration list and were used in repeating for the Republican ticket, including the said Sutherland; that thousands of votes were cast by persons not registered; that they voted the Republican ticket in various localities; that enough such votes were cast to change the result in the election of the United States Senator; that large sums of money were used for the purpose of corrupting the voters of the State and inducing them to vote the Republican ticket; and that except for such expenditures contrary to the laws of the State and such illegal votes, the said Howard Sutherland would not have been elected.

On the 29th day of December, 1917, the petitioner wrote the committee in substance:

That the preprimary expense account of Mr. Sutherland showed that he had spent more than the statute permitted; that by reason thereof he was not entitled to have his name upon the Republican ticket; that large sums of money were spent in the State to defeat him; and that enough votes were cast for Mr. Sutherland and enough people were voted who were not entitled to vote to change the election.

But he says he does not have at hand evidence enough to establish this fact; that he has neither the time nor the money to look up the proof; that as soon as war was declared he decided that he would do nothing, by word or deed, to inject a political note into the affairs of Congress; and that he does not desire to involve the Senate in a political investigation while the war is going on, and to do so would be very objectionable to him, and he would not want to take the responsibility of doing it. He therefore suggests that if, in the opinion of the committee or the Senate, there is nothing in the point of the reports made by Mr. Sutherland before and after the primaries to violate the law of the State of West Virginia so as to vitiate his election, he declines to offer any evidence as to other charges.

Mr. Sutherland in his answer to the original petition and memorial of Mr. Chilton, as well as in his reply to Mr. Chilton's letter of December 29, 1917, denies all of the charges against him concerning excessive primary election expenses, except that he admits his preprimary account shows an apparent excessive expenditure of $270.69, and that after certain deductions made by him in his afterprimary account there is an expenditure of $51.63 in excess of the amount permitted by the West Virginia law. He claims, however, that these accounts contained items aggregating $1,500, which are not considered an expenditure within the limits prescribed by the Federal statutes.

He denies all charges of corrupt or illegal or improper registration or voting which affected the result of the election.

In view of these statements by Mr. Chilton and Mr. Sutherland, your committee is of the opinion that there is no evidence before it to justify any investigation of alleged improper registration or improper or illegal voting, and that the charges in respect thereto have been entirely abandoned.

It, therefore, remains for us only to consider the effect of the alleged excessive expenses incurred by Howard Sutherland during the primary campaign, as shown by the accounts filed by him.

The corrupt-practice act of West Virginia, as amended in 1915, limits the amount of expenditures by the senatorial candidate at the primary election to $75 for each of the 55 counties in the State, or to $4,125. His preprimary account, as filed, shows a total expenditure of $4,395.69, or $270.69 in excess of the amount permitted by the statute.

The afterprimary account, as filed, recites that $375 was improperly charged to primary campaign expenses, and after deducting this sum his disbursements totaled $4,176.63, or $51.63 in excess of the amount permitted to be spent by the West Virginia statutes.

The only evidence before the committee as to the amount of the expenditures are the statements referred to and which are attached to the memorial or petition. If we accept them as correct without other proof before us, we must also assume that the sum of $375 claimed to be improperly charged to primary expenses was, in fact, improperly charged.

If, then, the sum of $51.63 was spent in excess of the statutory limitations, what is its legal effect? It is not claimed that any of the money set forth in the accounts referred to was corruptly spent; the only complaint relates to the amount.

Paragraph b of section 14 of the West Virginia corrupt-practices act provides that for certain violations of its provisions, which include excessive expenditures, any person "shall on conviction be disqualified from voting or holding any public office or employment during a period of three years from date of conviction, and if elected to or occupying any public office or employment such office or employment shall be vacated from the date of conviction." But no arrest has been made for this alleged violation of this statute, and no conviction has been had for such violation. Senator SUTHERLAND is therefore not subject to the penalties therein provided.

The only other provisions of the corrupt-practices act of West Virginia which seems to shed any light upon the subject before the committee are sections 15 and 16. They provide that a candidate for United States Senator, upon giving proper bond, can present to any circuit judge his petition, under oath, setting forth that corrupt and illegal practices contrary to the provisions of the act, specifying the same, were committed in connection with such election, naming any candidate as defendant and praying for a judicial inquiry into the alleged facts. Under this act, if the judge is of the opinion that the interests of public justice require a judicial inquiry, he may authorize it. If corrupt and illegal practices connected with the election are shown, "the evidence, opinion, and determination of the court" shall be certified and transmitted "to the proper authorities of the United States Government for such action as said authorities may deem proper."

Mr. Chilton filed his petition in the circuit court before Hon. James H. Miller, one of the judges of that court, asking for judicial inquiry into the election.

Mr. Sutherland filed his petition with the judges of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia for a writ of prohibition against Judge Miller. To this petition he answered, and Mr. Chilton filed his demurrer and answer thereto.

In passing upon this case the supreme court of appeals held that these statutes violated both the constitution of West Virginia and the Constitution of the United States.

They contravene the constitution of the State because, to quote the language of the syllabus:

"In so far as sections 15 and 16, chapter 27, act 1915, purport to authorize a judge to whom application is made, as therein provided, to order a judicial inquiry, if in his opinion the interests of public justice require it, to ascertain whether a candidate for United States Senator, in person or by his agents, expended to secure his election money or other things of value in excess of the amount allowed in that chapter sufficient to influence materially the result of the election and to require the judge to certify his opinion and determination and the evidence adduced before him upon such investigation 'to the governor of the State, who shall transmit the same to the proper authorities of the United States Government for such action as said authorities may deem proper,' they are obnoxious to and conflict with Article V of the constitution of this State, in that they attempt to empower a member of the judiciary, as such, to exercise a volition to determine when, to what extent, or whether the judicial inquiry into alleged corrupt practices shall be undertaken by him upon such application."

They also violate the Constitution of the United States, to again quote the syllabus of the supreme court of appeals, because:

"In the Senate of the United States, under an express declaration of the Federal Constitution, vests the exclusive power and authority to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its Members, and no other power or body lawfully can interpose or in any wise attempt to control or influence the determination of these questions, or declare void an election held to select such a Member."

In conclusion, let it be observed that Mr. Sutherland filed with the secretary of state his preprimary expense statement May 26, 1916, and his afterprimary statement June 20, 1916, as the statutes of West Virginia required. The information contained therein became accessible to all the electors of the State from the dates these accounts were filed.

So far as this committee is informed, no one before the election saw fit to challenge Mr. Sutherland's right to a place on the ticket as a candidate for Senator because of these excess expenditures, and no one either before or since the election has seen fit to institute criminal proceedings against him under the criminal statutes of the State, to which reference is above made. He has neither been arrested nor convicted of any offense against the corrupt-practices act of the State, and the subcommittee does not therefore believe that it would be jusified, under all of the circumstances, in holding that this excess expenditure of $51.63 should operate to vacate his seat, particularly when that fact itself is disputed.

The subcommittee, however, believes that all election laws, State or Federal, relating to the election of Senators should be strictly complied with, and therefore does not desire this report to be regarded as a precedent for disregard of State laws limiting expenditures in elections under circumstances differing from those of this particular case. They therefore recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That Howard Sutherland has been elected as Senator from the State of West Virginia for a term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1917, and that he is entitled to a seat in the Senate as such Senator."

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MARTIN. I send to the desk a resolution which I ask may be read and go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 268), as follows:

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the Senate at the conference on the bill (H. R. 9054) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," be, and they are hereby, instructed to recede from the amendment of the Senate numbered 44.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

W. M. RITTER LUMBER CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4127) to authorize the W. M. Ritter Lumber Co., a corporation, to construct bridges across the branches and tributaries of the Big Sandy River and their tributaries, in the counties of Buchanan and Dickenson, in the State of Virginia, which were, on page 1, line 8, to strike out "with single or double tracks"; on page 1, line 11, to strike out "such"; and on page 1, lines 11, 12, and 13, to strike out "as it may now or hereafter be desired for the passage of railroad, tramroad, or logging road engines, cars, and trains," and insert "suitable to the interests of navigation."

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4193) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3798) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4542) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

BLACKFEET INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. SMOOT. A week or ten days ago I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 4404) repealing that portion of the Indian appropriation act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stats. L., pp. 1015, 1035), which relates to the disposal of the surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Reservation in Montana, was ordered to a third reading and passed, and also that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill to the Senate. Since that time there has been passed by the Senate a general leasing bill in reference to Indian reservations. As the only item in the bill to which I objected was in relation to leasing upon a certain Indian reservation in Montana, I ask that the order for the return of the bill be rescinded and that the bill be transmitted to the other House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be rescinded. The bill has not been returned.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate June 26 (legislative day of June 24), 1918.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 26, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God our Heavenly Father, from whom proceedeth all things and unto whom we are indebted for the renewed blessings of daily life, imbue us plenteously, we beseech Thee, with the riches of Thy grace, that we may measure up to the highest aspirations of our own hearts and quit ourselves like men in all the duties Thou hast laid upon us.

We bless Thee for the cheering message from Italy in a signal victory over their invading foes. May it be an inspiration to them and our allies all along the line to greater exertions toward a victory which shall bring peace to suffering humanity; in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

CONFERENCE REPORT, LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

CONFERENCE REPORT, NAVAL BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman withhold that request for a moment? I wish to present a conference report on the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 10854), together with a statement, for printing under the rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield to enable me to ask him whether this is a complete report?

Mr. PADGETT. It is not.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

CONFERENCE REPORT, POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to an error in the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill, and in order to save time——

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] here?

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NOLAN. What became of the unanimous-consent request?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will get around to that in a minute.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts withhold for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold my point.

ADJOURNMENT RECESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes to make a statement, and then I shall prefer a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, some time ago we arranged with some Senators, tentatively, that if the President had no urgent legislation to pass at this time, and with his approval, we should have a recess adjournment for at least a month—possibly a month and 5 or 10 days—as soon as we get through with the appropriation bills and the conference reports on the appropriation bills, and also pass the census bill in the House. Senator MARTIN, Senator SIMMONS, and myself conferred with the President yesterday afternoon, and under the circumstances and believing, too, that a recess for a month would facilitate the preparation, consideration, and passage of the revenue bill in the House and the Senate, the President approved of the adjournment recess. So I want to say to the House we can send a resolution of adjournment over to the Senate just as soon as we clear up the appropriation bills and the conference reports on the appropriation bills and the census bill.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. That will be for a recess adjournment; that is, both Houses will join in the recess resolution. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact there are a few bills that will have to be disposed of to which I do not believe there is any opposition. The ones I refer to are bills reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. One is a bill extending the right of the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for the diversion of water at Niagara Falls. That right expires on the 1st of July. That bill passed the Senate unanimously, without any discussion, and I suppose everyone here recognizes the necessity of passing it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine that can be done in a very few moments.

Mr. FLOOD. Then I have another unanimous-consent bill to get in.

Mr. KITCHIN. That would be for the House to determine if unanimous consent should be granted.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is there to be any arrangement about the disposition of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar before taking a recess?

Mr. KITCHIN. If we get through with these other matters before July 1 or 2, we possibly could have that; but it would simply be by unanimous consent——

Mr. STEENERSON. I have a very urgent measure for the relief of some settlers who have paid for their land and complied with the law, and I have been waiting for over a year to get it up.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, this arrangement would not interfere with any unanimous consent the gentleman could get in the House.

Mr. GILLETT. Would it not be possible while waiting, perhaps, for conference reports to get a day in which to clear up the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. KITCHIN. Possibly we could do it, but I would suggest we would not let that interfere with the recess. We possibly could come here one night. I feel pretty sure that we could get all these conference reports in and out of the way by July 1 or 2, and while we are waiting for them we can take one afternoon or part of a day for the consideration of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. Would it be possible to arrange a day for the Private Calendar to be heard?

Mr. KITCHIN. If we can; while waiting on some of the conference reports, we could do that.

Mr. BORLAND. I have no doubt we will have days when we could take up the Private Calendar.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would suggest to the House it will be a great deal better to have the recess resolution passed as early as possible. We could make arrangements, I think, by having late sessions, to get away by July 1, certainly July 2.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not see Chairman SIMS in the House just now. Has the gentleman conferred with him in reference to the water-power bill that has been reported, and as to what chance there is to take it up before adjournment?

Mr. KITCHIN. We mentioned that bill in our conference with the President yesterday, and under the circumstances the President would be willing for it to go over. We assured him that we would get unanimous consent to consider the water-power bill immediately after the disposition of the revenue bill in the House when we return.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the circumstances, can the gentleman indicate about what day this recess adjournment might begin?

Mr. KITCHIN. If we get through these matters it will begin on July 1 or 2.

Mr. STAFFORD. And extend to what time?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not over a month and 10 days.

Mr. GILLETT. And the sooner and the more expeditiously we pass these appropriation bills the sooner we will get away?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and the sooner we will be ready to consider the revenue bill in the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the business on Calendar Wednesday to the extent and for the purpose of the consideration of conference reports, and that after the conference reports have been considered the regular business for Calendar Wednesday shall proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday so far as to consider the conference reports. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 9160. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10027. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 9612. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 7237) agreed to by the majority—and I was in the minority on that proposition—as made out and printed, is in error in this, that it proposes that the Senate recede from a House amendment. As a matter of fact, there was no house amendment. It is purely a technical objection, but the majority of the conferees—Mr. BELL, Mr. STEENERSON, and Mr. MADDEN—feel that this report (No. 689) ought to be withdrawn in order that the correction may be made. It was an error on the part of the Clerk in drawing the report. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report on the Post Office bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BENEFACTION OF THE LATE FRANK H. BUHL.

Mr. BESHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BESHLIN. Mr. Speaker, on many occasions during the present session of the House attention has been called to the generosity of various communities throughout the country as evidenced by subscriptions to liberty loans and the Red Cross. A citizen of my district, a resident of Sharon, Pa., Frank H. Buhl, died the other day, and his last will when offered for probate was found to contain such an unusual provision that I deem it of interest to the House to have it read.

I might say that this man has been known throughout that portion of the State for many years for his interest in matters of public welfare, and his praise is sounded throughout that locality by his fellow citizens.

I send to the desk to have read in my time a copy of the codicil to his last will, which shows in a very marked degree the great compassion he had for the unfortunate people of Belgium and northern France.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HERE IS BEQUEST TO WAR VICTIMS.

I give and bequeath to my executors herein named, in trust, however, for the purposes hereinafter named, the sum of two million ($2,000,000) dollars. The sum hereby bequeathed to my said executors is to be either expended by them in aiding the destitute or needy individuals in northern France or Belgium who have been reduced to such condition by reason of the ravages of the present war, or, if my executors elect, shall be expended in whole or in part for this purpose through the agency of any society or societies which may be in existence at the time of my death or which may thereafter be created for the purpose of affording such relief.

FRANK H. BUHL.

[Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to avail myself of this opportunity to give expression to the high esteem in which the people of southern Idaho held the late Mr. Frank H. Buhl, a portion of whose will for the relief of the unfortunate people of France and Belgium has just been read by the Clerk. Mr. Buhl not only disposed of his wealth by will in a most generous manner, but during his lifetime was always on the alert for opportunities to use a good portion of his large fortune for the development of the natural resources of the country, with a view of bringing comfort and happiness to those less favored than himself.

He was the prime mover and furnished a large portion of the capital for the development of the Twin Falls section of southern Idaho, the largest and most successful irrigation project in the United States. Through his initiative, his desire to be of service, and his willingness to risk a large portion of his fortune, he was instrumental in reclaiming from the desert over 200,000 acres of land by providing water for irrigation at an expense of over $4,000,000, and upon which there are now over 25,000 people residing who are happy, contented, and prosperous. On this tract there is the beautiful city of Twin Falls, with a population of 10,000, two daily papers, three banks, electric lights, and a fine water system is being installed at a cost of nearly one-half million of dollars. Another city, named in honor of the prime mover in this great enterprise, Buhl, contains 3,000 people and is growing rapidly. There are also the towns of Kimberly, named in honor of one of Mr. Buhl's associates; Hansen, Filer, and Murtaugh, and numerous villages.

Mr. Buhl's great aim in investing his money was not one of profit, as is ordinarily the case, but in order that he might place thousands of people in a position to build homes for themselves and families. The land was sold for a price scarcely sufficient to bring a fund large enough to construct the great project, including the Milner Dam, which cost over $1,000,000 alone.

Mr. Buhl presented to the city of Twin Falls 10 acres of land for a public park within the center of the town site, upon which is situated the courthouse and high school, each costing nearly $200,000. He presented the city of Buhl, in addition to land for parks, a high-school building, at a cost of nearly $50,000.

What he has accomplished in Idaho furnishes a splendid example of how those favored with this world's goods can contribute to the happiness, comfort, and prosperity of the people, and is a lasting monument to his foresight and good judgment.

His name will ever be held in grateful remembrance by every person residing on the Twin Falls tract because of the opportunity he has afforded them to establish themselves, and also by the people who are interested in the upbuilding of our State. His philanthropic spirit and his willingness to invest his money in order that the resources of the State might be developed and made available for those who need encouragement and substantial assistance should be an inspiration to men of large fortune to emulate his example. What greater or more lasting monument can be erected or what more satisfactory accomplishment can be placed to the credit of any man?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of pay and promotion of the medical branch of the Army service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of pay and promotion of the medical branch of the Army service. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 634).

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, H. R. 10358.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk proceeded to read the conference report.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement was read.

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 90: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"The minimum of daily hours of labor required of all clerks and other employees of the several executive departments and independent establishments, prescribed by section 7 of the act of March 15, 1898, as amended, is increased during the period of the existing war from seven hours to eight hours under the same authority and conditions specified in the said act as amended."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendments numbered 38 and 90 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, namely:

On No. 38: Strikes out, as proposed by the Senate, the paragraph inserted by the House authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the Subtreasuries within six months after the termination of the existing war.

On No. 90: Appropriates for increased compensation at the rate of $120 per annum to certain Government employees in the manner proposed by the House, modified in the following particulars: Increases the maximum compensation for the persons who shall participate in such additional pay from $2,000, as proposed by the House, to $2,500, as proposed by the Senate; provides, as proposed by the Senate, that employees paid from lump-sum appropriations in bureaus or other Government agencies created since January 1, 1916, shall not participate in such increased compensation; provides, as proposed by the Senate, that employees of the United States under so-called agency contracts shall not participate in such increased compensation; and provides, as proposed by the House, that the minimum of daily hours of labor of clerks and other employees shall be increased from seven to eight hours during the period of the existing war.

JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
JOHN M. EVANS,
WILLIAM H. STAFFORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to move that the House disagree to that portion of the conference report that affects the hours of the Government clerks here?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr AUSTIN. Then the question is voting down the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]?

The SPEAKER. In order to reject the provision you have got to vote down the whole thing; either take it as a whole or reject it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that it would be quite futile to urge the rejection of this conference report at this time. The Members of the House are anxious to conclude the work of the session and return to their homes.

There is one provision in the conference report which I believe should be rejected, and that is the provision relating to the Borland amendment. The conferees have been considering that provision for some weeks, and I regret that the conferees on behalf of the House did not see fit to yield to the Senate amendment.

The attempt at this time to establish a change in the hours of the Government clerks is, to quote the language of a distinguished Senator, "a foolish piece of legislation."

The amendment does not provide for an eight-hour day. If it provided for the same kind of eight-hour day that other Government employees have, no one would object, because the workers in the arsenals and in the shipyards have an eight-hour day which provides time and a half for overtime. But this amendment which you gentlemen are about to adopt provides that Government clerks shall work not less than eight hours a day.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that when this proposal was first brought before Congress we were told that it would result in a great saving to the Government of the United States. Not one penny has been deducted from this appropriation bill as the result of the adoption of this amendment, and I venture the prediction that no man in this House will live long enough to see one penny taken off the appropriations as the result of the adoption of this amendment. Therefore, it will effect no saving to the Government of the United States.

The clerks who are now employed by the Government are willing to work just as much overtime as may be necessary to do the work of the Government, and they are willing to work overtime without compensation. All that they have asked has been that the arrangement which has existed here for many years shall be permitted to continue, and that when the Government work permits, the clerks shall be worked seven hours a day.

Now, you gentlemen are about to say that they shall work not less than eight hours a day, and if they work more than eight hours a day they shall not receive pay for overtime.

I want to indulge in another prediction. Not only will this amendment not effect a saving to the Government, but it will actually increase the expenses of the Government, because the sense of fair play among Members of this House will eventually lead to the adoption of legislation which will give these clerks pay for overtime, and in so far as that pay is granted the expense to the Government will be increased. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. AUSTIN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman having this bill in charge give me five minutes?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to delay this conference report.

The SPEAKER. This is not delaying it very much. The gentleman from Tennessee has an hour.

Mr. BORLAND. I have not asked for time in defense of the provision, but it does seem to me that if gentlemen indulge themselves here in further attacks upon this provision that the House has so fully considered, I should like at least five minutes' time. It seems to me rather unnecessary that we should take up the time of the House with a matter that the House has fully considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to have five minutes to answer him.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, it is rather surprising to me that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] should attempt to stifle discussion on this proposition in view of the many, many speeches he has been making on it in the last three or four years.

Why should we discriminate against the clerks in the Government service by failing, in this proposed amendment, to grant them extra pay for extra service? The Government, in consequence of legislation we have passed and an Executive order by the President, is now paying the employees in Government shipyards, navy yards, arsenals, and other Government activities extra pay for all extra time over eight hours. This bill does not carry a provision to pay the Government clerks for extra time. It unjustly discriminates against them.

Mr. Speaker, this case is so well and thoroughly stated by the American Federation of Labor in its recent national convention that I ask the Clerk to read as a part of my remarks the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution 71, adopted by the American Federation of Labor Convention, St. Paul, Minn., June 18, 1918, by Delegates Luther C. Steward, E. J. Newmyer, and Charles F. Nagl, of the National Federation of Federal Employees; Thomas F. Flaherty, of the National Federation of Postal Employees; Edw. J. Gainor, of the National Association of Letter Carriers; and E. J. Ryan, William Collins, and Walter J. Brown, of the Railway Mail Association:

Whereas under the provisions of the act of Congress of March 15, 1898, employees of the Federal Government are required to work not less than seven hours per day, and under the same bill heads of departments are authorized to require longer hours of service when the exigencies require; and

Whereas the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, as adopted by the House of Representatives on March 15, 1918, contains a provision whereby Government employees are required to work a minimum of eight hours per day, the effect of such requirement being to increase by more than 14 per cent their present hours of service, with substantially no increase whatever over their present wages for such increased hours; and

Whereas sponsors of this bill have stated, with a view of obtaining the support of organized labor, that they are merely trying to establish for all Government employees the eight-hour day for which organized labor stands; and

Whereas the effect of the proposed bill is not to establish the maximum eight-hour day of organized labor, with time and one-half for overtime, but it is a minimum eight-hour day, with no pay whatever for overtime: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Thirty-eighth Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor, assembled at St. Paul, Minn., That we denounce this proposed legislation not only because it is an insult to patriotic Government employees, many of whom constantly work long hours overtime for which they receive no extra pay, but because we believe it is a covert attack on the standard eight-hour day, with pay and one-half for overtime, for which organized labor stands; and be it further

Resolved, That the executive council of the American Federation of Labor be instructed to inform all Members of Congress that organized labor is unalterably opposed to this proposed vicious legislation, and to take the appropriate means for defeating the same.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to use just two or three minutes. The conferees did not have the question of overtime before them. No action had been taken on the question of overtime, either by the House or the Senate, and therefore it was not a proper matter for the consideration of the conferees. If the question of overtime is to be taken up, it must, of course, come by way of separate legislation.

This House has gone on record in favor of what is known as the Borland amendment. The conferees endeavored as best they could to carry out the express recorded wish of the House with reference to this amendment, and agreed upon a compromise amendment, which has been reported and read from the Clerk's desk. That amendment simply provides that there shall be a minimum eight-hour day in the departments and establishments of this Government in Washington during the existence of the present war; and, gentlemen, I have enough confidence in the patriotism and loyalty of the clerks and employees of the Government [applause] to believe that there will not be one of them who will object to giving this extra hour to his Government during this war. We are at a time now when we are appropriating millions of dollars for the purpose of providing housing facilities here in the city of Washington for the extra clerks needed in the conduct of the Government's business during this war. We are needing thousands of additional clerks to come here to perform this business, and I am sure that when the people of the country are giving their time and giving their money and energy and all that is in them to help to win this war, the clerks and employees of this Government, who are equally as patriotic, will be glad to render this additional service. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not see any occasion for this undue and unusual haste in adopting a conference report which contains some things which I am sure some of the Members of the House do not understand. I do not understand why we should adopt one rule for the employees of the Senate and pay certain of the employees of the Senate increased compensation and deny that increased compensation to similar employees of this House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, that has not been done.

Mr. GOOD. I understand it has been done. I understand that every person that is employed by the Senate, either as a clerk to a Senator or otherwise, receives, if his salary is less than $2,500, $120 extra compensation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is quite true, but——

Mr. GOOD. No person employed as a clerk or secretary by a Member of this House receives a penny of increased compensation. Is it possible that the high cost of living affects the employees of the Senate and does not affect similar employees of the House?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true, I will say to the gentleman, but it is due to the fact that the clerks to Members are not on the roll, as they ought to be. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Probably that is true; but when the conferees were considering this report the whole matter was in their hands, and they could have written into that conference report a provision that would have put these employees on the same basis with the like employees of the Senate.

Another thing: This House went on record in favor of abolishing the Subtreasuries. There is absolutely no reason why we should continue to pay in the neighborhood of $500,000 a year for the maintenance of an organization which the bureau that was appointed to investigate the Subtreasuries found there was no reason for continuing. Yet I suppose we are to go on now for the next year and during this war, at least, continuing these Subtreasuries, selling liberty bonds and levying taxes to pay useless salaries, when there is not an argument advanced why they should be continued, except to provide fat salaries for a number of persons. We should refuse to adopt the report, containing, as it does, this indefensible provision.

With regard to the Borland amendment, when the House took up the proposition with regard to increased pay for Government employees the law was that these clerks should work seven hours per day, and on those hours of service we based an increase of $10 per month. And then, after we had done that, we adopted the Borland amendment, which compelled every one of these clerks to work one hour more every day. The increased compensation that we have granted to them does not pay for the increased labor that we are demanding of them by this legislation. We have added one hour to their labor but not a cent to pay for that extra hour's work. So that every Government clerk under this bill does not receive one-eighth more pay, but he is compelled to do one-eighth more service. I believe these Government employees are patriotic. This House and Congress is patriotic. The clerks will, of course, do what Congress requires, but we ought not to ask a single clerk to do more now for the same pay than he did before, especially when we are increasing the income of every farmer in the country, of every miner in the country, of every mechanic in the country, by way of allowing increased prices for those commodities they have to sell and things that the Government needs. If we are to require an additional hour's service of the clerks, let the Government pay them for that service. They are patriotic, they are willing to wait, they are fair, and I think the House ought to be fair. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum, and demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. One thing at a time. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-four Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the adoption of this conference report will vote "yea," those opposed "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 198, nays 122, answered "present" 1, not voting 109, as follows:

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. BROWNING. I voted "no." I wish to withdraw that vote and be recorded as present.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

CONFERENCE REPORT, POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill H. R. 7237, the Post Office appropriation bill, for printing in the RECORD.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a short statement for the information of the House in order to present the status of water-power legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there was a statement made in the House this morning in reference to taking a recess. I did not hear it, but I understand that the matter has not yet been acted upon. Gentlemen of the House know that at the request of the President a special committee on water-power legislation was created by a special rule, composed of six members from the Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Public Lands, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I was appointed chairman of that committee. The facts are that that committee has considered, as the rule provided, all legislation pertaining to water power or dams for such purposes. Among others, was Senate bill 1419 that passed the Senate in December last. This joint special committee could be in session only when six members of each of the committees from which it was composed could attend. All three of those committees had legislation to consider that was absolutely and necessarily important to be considered, reported, and passed by the House. We have made every effort to get a water-power bill reported. A bill has now been ordered reported and will be upon the calendar as soon as the formal report can be written. We are anxious to have the bill considered by the House before any recess is taken, for the reason that a Senate bill has already passed and will be amended by way of a substitute. As soon as it has passed the House and goes back to the Senate it can immediately go to conference and the conferees can consider the bill during the recess, if there is one, and be ready to report when the recess ends, if one is taken.

Now, I think the Members, perhaps, understood that the Senate has to pass this bill after it gets over there. Such is not the case. All the Senate has to do is to disagree to the House amendment and send it to conference and appoint conferees. During the recess will be one of the best times imaginable for the conferees to iron out the differences and settle them between the two Houses. What I wanted to say is that I hope no recess will be agreed on or taken until that bill has been disposed of by the House. I am as anxious as anyone to have the Congress finish its work and adjourn, but to take a recess without first having finished our legislative program is most objectionable from any standpoint.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LONERGAN, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for two days, on account of important business.

STEAMBOAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees, and when the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries was reached,

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill S. 2104, on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2104) to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and they are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4402. That there shall be a supervising inspector general, who shall be appointed from time to time by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be selected with reference to his fitness and ability to systematize and carry into effect all the provisions of law relating to the Steamboat-Inspection Service, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $5,000 a year and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business assigned him by competent authority, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce.

"The Secretary of Commerce may appoint a deputy supervising inspector general, who shall be the chief clerk of the bureau and in the absence of the supervising inspector general have power to act in his stead, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 per year.

"SEC. 4404. There shall be 11 supervising inspectors, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each of them shall be selected for his knowledge, skill, and practical experience in the uses of steam for navigation, and shall be a competent judge of the character and qualities of steam vessels and of all parts of the machinery employed in steaming. Each supervising inspector shall be entitled to a salary of $3,450 a year and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business assigned him by competent authority, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce.

"SEC. 4414. There shall be in each of the following collections districts, namely, the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; San Francisco, Cal.; New London, Conn.; Baltimore, Md.; Detroit, Mich.; Chicago, Ill.; Bangor, Me.; New Haven, Conn.; Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Willamette, Oreg.; Puget Sound, Wash.; Savannah, Ga.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Oswego, N. Y.; Charleston, S. C.; Duluth, Minn.; Superior, Mich.; Apalachicola, Fla.; Galveston, Tex.; Mobile, Ala.; Providence, R. I.; and in each of the following ports: New York, N. Y.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Tampa, Fla.; Portland, Me.; Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Toledo, Ohio; Norfolk, Va.; Evansville, Ind.; Dubuque, Iowa; Louisville, Ky.; Albany, N. Y.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis, Mo.; Port Huron, Mich.; New Orleans, La.; Los Angeles, Cal.; Juneau, Alaska; St. Michael, Alaska; Point Pleasant, W. Va.; and Burlington, Vt.; Honolulu, Hawaii; and San Juan, Porto Rico, one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers.

"The inspector of hulls and the inspector of boilers in the districts and ports enumerated in the preceding paragraphs shall be entitled to the following salaries, to be paid under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, namely:

"For the port of New York, N. Y., at the rate of $2,950 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Philadelphia, Pa., Baltimore, Md., San Francisco, Cal., and Puget Sound, Wash., and the ports of Boston, Mass., Buffalo, N. Y., and New Orleans, La., at the rate of $2,700 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Michigan, Mich., Milwaukee, Wis., Duluth, Minn., Providence, R. I., Chicago, Ill., and the ports of Albany, N. Y., Cleveland, Ohio, Portland, Me., Los Angeles, Cal., Juneau, Alaska, St. Michael, Alaska, and Norfolk, Va., Honolulu, Hawaii, and San Juan, P. R., at the rate of $2,500 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Oswego, N. Y., Willamette, Oreg., Detroit, Mich., and Mobile, Ala., and the ports of St. Louis, Mo., and Port Huron, Mich., at the rate of $2,350 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Pittsburgh, Pa., New Haven, Conn., Savannah, Ga., Charleston, S. C., Galveston, Tex., New London, Conn., Superior, Mich., Bangor, Me., and Apalachicola, Fla., and the ports of Dubuque, Iowa, Toledo, Ohio, Evansville, Ind., Memphis, Tenn., Nashville, Tenn., Point Pleasant, W. Va., Burlington, Vt., Jacksonville, Fla., Tampa, Fla., Louisville, Ky., and Cincinnati, Ohio, at the rate of $2,100 per year for each local inspector.

"And in addition the Secretary of Commerce may appoint, in districts or ports where the volume of work requires them, assistant inspectors, at a salary, for the port of New York, of $2,500 a year each; for the port of New Orleans, La.; the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; the ports of Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.; and the districts of San Francisco, Cal., at $2,350 per year each, and for all other districts and ports at a salary of $2,100 a year each; and he may appoint a clerk to any such board at a compensation not exceeding $1,500 a year to each person so appointed. Every inspector provided for in this or the preceding sections of this title shall be paid his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business assigned him by competent authority, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce.

"Assistant inspectors, appointed as provided by law, shall perform such duties of actual inspection as may be assigned to them under the direction, supervision, and control of the local inspectors.

"The Secretary of Commerce may appoint not exceeding four traveling inspectors when in his judgment they are necessary for the improvement of the service, each of whom shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 a year and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business

"And the Secretary of Commerce may from time to time detail said assistant inspectors of one port or district for service in any other port or district, as the needs of the Steamboat-Inspection Service may, in his discretion, require, and the actual necessary traveling expenses of assistant inspectors so detailed, while traveling on official business assigned them by competent authority, shall, subject to such limitations as the said Secretary may in his discretion prescribe, be paid in the same manner as provided in this section for inspectors."

The House automatically resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FERRIS in the chair.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that under the rule two hours of general debate is allowed, to be confined to the subject matter of the bill. I will control one half of that time and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] the other half.

Mr. Chairman, the Steamboat-Inspection Service is one of the most important services connected with our American merchant marine. Prior to the beginning of the present war we had less than 1,000,000 tons of shipping under the American flag engaged in the foreign trade. We now have more than 3,000,000 tons of shipping under the American flag engaged in the foreign trade, and I confidently expect that within the next year or 18 months we will have not less than 10,000,000 tons of shipping under the American flag engaged in the over-seas trade. Hence, with the expansion of our American merchant marine it becomes of the utmost importance that we should have an efficient steamboat or marine-inspection service.

The bill under consideration is a bill to increase the pay of the men in the Steamboat-Inspection Service. It increases the pay of the supervising inspector general, his chief clerk, who, under the provisions of the bill, in the absence of the supervising inspector general would act as supervising inspector general. It increases the pay of the supervising inspectors, 10 in number now. The bill also provides for one additional, making 11 supervising inspectors. The bill also increases the pay of the local and assistant inspectors, a force all told, at the time this bill was considered in the committee, of 255 men. The pay of the men in this service has not been increased for many years. When I tell you that the pay of the local inspectors under the existing law ranges from a maximum of $2,500 down to $1,500 a year, and that the pay of supervising inspectors is $3,000 a year, I think that you will agree with me that if we would maintain the efficiency of this service and retain the men charged with responsible duties devolving upon them in the service, an increase of pay is imperatively demanded.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not a fact that at the present time the pay of these men in Government employ is far below the pay of the same character of men in private employment?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is true; and I will say further that these men are selected under the civil-service law. Every man must have seen service at sea, either as a master or a mate, or as an engineer. The pay of the men in that service at this time is 75 to 100 per cent more than the pay of the men in the Steamboat Service.

Legislation along the lines proposed in this bill has been urged for many years past, not only by the men directly interested but by the Department of Commerce, the American Bureau of Shipping, by commercial bodies, and the steamship companies on our Great Lakes and in our coastwise and foreign service, and by others interested in the welfare of the men, and in making this service more efficient.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States thought the matter of such great importance that it employed Mr. N. Sumner Myrick, a prominent lawyer and a splendid citizen of Boston, to make a thorough investigation of the Steamboat-Inspection Service. In his report to the Chamber of Commerce Mr. Myrick strongly urged a substantial increase in pay for the men in the service, not only as an act of justice long deferred to a body of worthy men, but also with a view of drawing to and holding in the service a class of men who would improve the personnel and raise the standard of efficiency in the Steamboat-Inspection Service in the future. Mr. Chairman, we have under consideration at this time Senate bill 2104.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries reported to the House H. R. 9908 on February 15 last. H. R. 9908 is a committee substitute for H. R. 4206, introduced by my esteemed colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York, Mr. ROWE, and H. R. 5010, which was introduced by the gentleman from New York, Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Hearings were had on these bills on January 17, January 18, January 24, and January 31, 1918. The following-named parties were heard by the committee: Capt. Thomas H. Foster, an assistant inspector of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, of New York; Congressman CHARLES B. SMITH, of New York; Mr. John E. Wilson, inspector of boilers at the port of Philadelphia; Tobias D. Noel, inspector of boilers at the port of New York; Gen. George Uhler, Supervising Inspector General of the Steamboat-Inspection Service; Mr. N. Sumner Myrick, a member of the shipping committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, now of this city; H. M. McLarin, national president of the National Federation of Federal Employees, of Washington, D. C.; Mr. Irving L. Evans, of Cleveland, Ohio; and Capt. William A. Westcott, president of the Masters, Mates, and Pilots of the Pacific, San Francisco, Cal.

Many letters indorsing the legislation have been received from men in the service, and while it is not entirely satisfactory to them, as the increases in pay are not as great as they think they are entitled to, yet in view of war conditions and the ever-increasing demands upon the Treasury, the Committee on the Merchant Marine were unwilling to do more at this time in recommending increases, and the men affected have accepted the bill as reported out by the committee in good faith and are asking the Congress to enact it into law.

Mr. Stevenson Taylor, president of the American Bureau of Shipping; Mr. N. L. Cullin, secretary and treasurer of the National Board of Steam Navigation; Mr. Ben. Mitchell, president of the American Pilots' Association; and H. H. Raymond, president of the Clyde Steamship Co., and others too numerous to mention, wrote me letters strongly indorsing the bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there, or would he prefer to have me wait until later?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would prefer to have the gentleman wait until later. The Committee on Commerce of the Senate did the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries the honor to amend the bill (S. 2104) now under consideration to conform to the provisions of the House bill, and in the report of the bill to the Senate they incorporated the report of the Committee on the Merchant Marine on H. R. 9908 in their report on S. 2104 to the Senate. There is this difference, however, between the Senate bill and the House bill: The House bill carries a provision authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to appoint a deputy supervising inspector general, who shall be the chief clerk of the bureau, and in the absence of the supervising inspector general have power to act in his stead, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 per year. The Senate bill does not contain that provision, and at the proper time I will offer a committee amendment containing that provision.

Mr. Hoover is the chief clerk of the Steamboat-Inspection Service. Until the last year or two I did not know the salary that he received, and I was astonished to learn that it was only $2,000 a year.

Gen. Uhler, Chief of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, was appointed by President McKinley and has been continuously in the service ever since. Mr. Hoover has been in the service for 15 years and has been chief clerk for 15 years past and his salary has been $2,000 a year. As I have said, the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries when they had the bill H. R. 9908 under consideration inserted a provision authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to appoint a deputy supervising inspector general, who shall be chief clerk of the bureau in the absence of the supervising inspector general and shall have power to act in his stead, and making his salary $5,000 a year, and I assume that there can not be any reasonable objection to this increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I may say for the information of the gentleman, if he has not the information at present, that the Secretary of Commerce has recommended for a number of years past an increase of Gen. Uhler's pay as head of the Steamboat-Inspection Service from $4,000 to $5,000. The committee reporting the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill has declined to grant the increase. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, however, that while in prior years before our entry into the war the Secretary of Commerce recommended that increase, in the estimates as submitted this past year for the bill adopted just a few moments ago he did not make any recommendation of an increase, because I believe it was the policy of the administration, approved by the President, that there should be no increases of these higher-paid officials during the present war. At least, the Attorney General of the United States came before our committee and stated that he would not make any recommendations of increases during the existing war because he believed it was the policy of the administration not to do so. Now, why has the committee gone ahead and made this recommendation when it is the set policy of the administration, and of Congress I might say, not to grant any increases of these higher-paid officials at the present time?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will call the gentleman's attention to the report of the committee which was made by Mr. ROWE, in which he incorporates a letter from the Secretary of Commerce expressly approving this bill and urging its enactment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am fully aware of that letter; I read it before the gentleman directed my attention to it. Of course, I know the Secretary of Commerce is not adverse to making recommendations for increases——

Mr. ALEXANDER. What is the gentleman's point?

Mr. STAFFORD. That it is the policy of the administration——

Mr. ALEXANDER. How does the gentleman know?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because the Attorney General has stated before our subcommittee that he would not recommend any increases of salaries, because he did not believe it was advisable in these stressful times.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We are not considering any legislation coming from the Department of Justice; we are considering legislation which has to do with the Department of Commerce, and the Secretary of Commerce has recommended this increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet the Secretary of Commerce, if the gentleman will permit, did not this year, for the first time in many years, in his book of estimates make any recommendation for an increase of the salary of the chief of the service.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Secretary of Commerce knew very well this bill was under consideration by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and that it carried this increase, and there was no occasion for him to come before the Committee on Appropriations and ask for it. There are some other committees in this House besides the Committee on Appropriations capable of considering the merits of these cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am only directing attention to the policy. I am not questioning the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries has full jurisdiction over increase of salaries. No one questions that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I expect I am as much authorized to speak as regards the policy of the administration as the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is far more so than I am. I only reflect the testimony before the Committee on Appropriations. That is the reason I asked the gentleman the question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have no information of that sort from the administration. I do know that these increases are recommended by the Secretary of Commerce, and, better than that, I know they have merit and ought to be given fair consideration. The Senate has recognized the merit and justice of the increases of pay carried in the bill, because the Senate amended the Senate bill to conform to the provisions of H. R. 9008, which carries an increase for the Chief of the Steamboat-Inspection Service. The only difference between the two bills is that the Senate bill omits any increase for the chief clerk in the Steamboat-Inspection Service.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Preliminary, if I might, I heartily approve this increase of Gen. Uhler's salary. I think he should have had it years ago. He has been at the head of a bureau, and it has been the universal policy that the head of a bureau should receive $5,000 a year. He is an unusually capable, efficient, and accommodating man, and everybody knows that. I want to ask in reference to the proposed assistant supervising inspector general. I assume it is the intention to promote the present chief clerk to this position which is thus created?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Inasmuch as the Supervising Inspector General and also the 11 supervising inspectors must be confirmed by the Senate, does not the gentleman think that this particular official, as a matter of permanent law, ought to be confirmed by the Senate in harmony with those who are above and below him? Has the committee given consideration to that matter?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The chief clerk, under the provisions of the House amendment to the Senate bill, would be designated as the deputy supervising inspector general and chief clerk of the bureau, and I would hardly think that necessary. Of course, what we had in mind was the increase in the salary of Mr. Hoover, who has been in this service for many years and who is a man of extraordinary fidelity and efficiency in the service, but no good reason occurred to us why his appointment should go to the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would have the same point of view as the gentleman if it were not provided here that a new position is being created——

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; it is hardly a new position. He is to serve temporarily in the absence of the Supervising Inspector General. He acts in that capacity now, being designated by the Secretary of Commerce to serve in the absence of the Supervising Inspector General.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I gathered from this paragraph, however, that a new position of considerable importance is made permanent by law, that of deputy supervising inspector general. Doubtless it would be advisable that the chief clerk should be appointed to that. I assume that would be done.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In the absence of the Supervising Inspector General the Secretary of Commerce now designates Mr. Hoover to act as Supervising Inspector General. In this bill we simply make an express provision of law to that effect. It may not be necessary, but the committee were of opinion that it is best to write it in the law.

Mr. GILLETT. What does the chief clerk get now?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Two thousand dollars a year.

Mr STAFFORD This only increases it a thousand dollars.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Only $1,000, and yet he is one of the most competent men in the service, and he is charged with very responsible duties.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Minnesota? This bill is not intended to change the functions or the duties that Mr. Hoover is performing now. It does change the name by calling him "deputy supervising inspector general" who shall be chief clerk. We gave him a new name and additional salary. And I wish to say this: That Mr. Hoover was before us, and I do not believe a more competent or efficient man has ever appeared before the committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. And he has been there for 15 years.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. From what I know of Mr. Hoover and his work my opinion is the same as that of the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. We only change his title. We did not change his duties.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota There has been brought up for attention here a subject in which I have been vitally interested for a great many years There are 11 supervising inspectors?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There are 10 now in the service, and this adds one.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. With the advice and consent of the Senate. Is there anything in the law to indicate where each of these supervising inspectors shall keep his office?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No. The country is divided into inspection districts, and I suppose they have their office at some central point in the district.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman knows that some of the inspection districts are exceedingly grotesque, I am sure?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The boundaries are not defined by Congress. They are defined by the department.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, let me call the gentleman's attention to one specific case. I will omit the rest, although I have some others in mind. But this one I am particularly interested in. The city of Duluth, which is the largest port in the world, and has the largest registration of ships of any city in America, with the exception of New York, is under a supervising inspector who has his office at Dubuque, Iowa, where there is practically no commerce, practically nothing to do; and that condition has been that way for many years. Now, I am not going to tire the House or ask the gentleman to reveal, if he knows, the conditions under which the supervising inspector's office in one night was removed to Dubuque many years ago? But is there not some way in which that can be changed? We have suffered under it for a long time, and the work is all at Duluth.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I agree with the gentleman; it ought to be taken there.

Mr. Chairman, I will just detain the committee a moment or two more.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman indorse the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] about this deputy supervising inspector general, that there is no change in his duties but simply a change in the name, and therefore by changing the name we are paying $1,000 for it?

Mr. HARDY. The "gentleman from Texas" did not say that we just changed the name.

Mr. GILLETT. He said we changed the name but did not change the duties. I made the deduction that $1,000, therefore, was given to the name.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no. If the bill did not provide for his designation as deputy inspector general, I would favor and the committee would favor an increase of his pay to $3,000 a year as chief clerk, without reference to the added duties or dignities.

Mr. HARDY. Let me make this statement to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I did not go into it fully. He has been serving at this pay for 15 years, and we felt that he, like all the rest, under the increased cost of living and under the conditions, was entitled to a raise whether we changed his title or not.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that point. We want to get through with this bill.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that this is an important measure. It is boosting salaries at $1,000 a clip, and there ought to be a quorum here to consider it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman withdraw the motion for a few minutes?

Mr. WALSH. No; I will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is none, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCCLINTIC, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (S. 2104) to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, had found itself without a quorum, and he had directed that the roll be called, whereupon 273 Members, a quorum, had answered to their names, and he submitted a list of the absentees for printing in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session, with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] in the chair.

Accordingly the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2104, with Mr. FERRIS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2104, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2104. An act to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

STEAMBOAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I note the report and the bill do not specify what the increases are in these particular cases. Will the gentleman tell us what these various increases in these positions amount to in the bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The pay of the local inspectors and assistants under existing law ranges from $2,500 down to $1,500. The increases provided in the bill make the minimum $2,100 and the maximum $2,950. The larger increases, of course, affect those whose pay is $1,500, $1,800, and $2,000. The smaller the salary the larger the increase. I will incorporate with my remarks tables showing the number of men now in the service, where located, their present pay, and the increases provided in the bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the gentleman something that I would like to have information about?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I notice these ports or districts have been grouped into classes, as the gentleman has just stated. New York seems to be the highest class, the inspectors therein securing a salary of $2,950, which really is but an increase of $50 a year for each. And then there is the next class, and they are enumerated—Philadelphia, Baltimore, San Francisco, Puget Sound, and so on—and they get $2,700. Then there is a third class, which gets $2,500; and a fourth class, getting $2,350; and still a fifth class, which is a sort of a residuum class, getting $2,100. Is not the work of each of these men of the same character, and does it not require the same qualifications? And what is the reason for having different compensations for the same kind of work, if the work is the same?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Because the character of the work in the different ports is different. It is true the general qualifications of the inspectors under the law are the same. They pass the same form of civil-service examination, but the duties of the inspectors in the ports of New York and Philadelphia and Boston and Baltimore and San Francisco are greater and call for a higher degree of skill and efficiency than is required in many other ports. They have various types of vessels to inspect, and recognizing their more varied and important duties for many years past the inspectors in some ports have received a larger rate of pay than in others.

Now, in framing this bill the committee did not undertake to readjust the salaries, but base the increases on the salary now received.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman has concluded, I would like to ask him another question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would like to complete my statement.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The original bills for which this is a substitute based increases on the present rate of pay of the local inspectors and assistant inspectors at the different ports. The inspectors themselves tried to get together and readjust their pay on a more equitable basis and make the increases apply to that readjustment of pay, but they found they could not do it. The effort created friction among them, and they gave it up, and for that reason they recommended to the committee that the increases should be based on the present rate of pay, and in that respect we conformed to their view. We thought that if they could not agree among themselves it would be a hopeless task for us to undertake to attempt to make a readjustment that would be satisfactory to them. I had correspondence with them, in which I called attention to that matter, because, like the gentleman from Minnesota, it was my view that men with substantial qualifications and performing the same class of service should have the same rate of pay without reference to the port.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I feel that way very strongly myself. I would like to ask the gentleman this: Was any effort made to reclassify these various districts or places or ports so as to harmonize the classification with any changed conditions that may have occurred during recent years, such as the building up of some ports and reducing others in importance?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Section 4414 is in the language of the existing law, except the increases in the rate of pay. We do not change the law in any other respect at all.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Would the gentleman consider an amendment that would take Duluth, Minn., out from the third class, where it now is, and put it in the second class?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I could not do it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman could be shown that Duluth belongs in the second class, or in the first class for that matter, would he consider favorably such an amendment?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I can give the gentleman the view of the inspectors in the service, and they do not favor that being done.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not care what the inspectors favor or do not favor, whether it is right or wrong is the determining factor.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it would be wrong. We are considering the Senate bill, in which the increases are identical with the increases in the House bill, except the one relating to New York, in which we make the increase $2,950 and the Senate makes it $2,900, and the only other amendment that is proposed to the Senate bill by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries is the amendment on page 2, which is shown in italic. It would lead to confusion and perhaps to the defeat of this bill if each port in the United States should undertake to assert its dignity, as compared with other ports, and want to reclassify the men in this service and readjust their pay.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then, even though the classification once made is wrong, because it was once made we should not change it and make it right? The gentleman has assumed to bring in a bill to rectify certain wrongs, and he certainly ought to have the support of the House in that; but if he is going to rectify one wrong, why not rectify two?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think you can do that on the floor of the House. But I may say that the committee was of the gentleman's view at first, but after giving it careful consideration they were in favor of recommending the plan adopted by the men in the service.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that when the time arrives I am going to make a motion to fix the salaries of all these men the same. I do not know whether the gentleman will accept it or not. If he does not, probably it will not prevail; but that will express my views, and if my motion does not prevail I shall not care whether this bill becomes a law or not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In other words, will the gentleman vote to defeat an increase to anyone in the service just because he can not have his own way?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Oh, no; the gentleman knows very well indeed that I do not want to do that; but this bill increases the salaries of two gentlemen in Washington, and of others in the service, and what I am after is to have a reclassification of these men in accordance with the facts. I think we ought to do that when we have the matter up, and if we can not do it on the floor, if the bill goes back to the committee probably we can.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I prefer to proceed, but I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. ROBBINS. I see here you have increased the pay of the inspectors for the city of Pittsburgh from $2,000 to only $2,100, and you put Pittsburgh in with a port like Point Pleasant, W. Va., which is a very small port.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have not put it in at all. That is the existing law. We have not changed the law in any respect except to increase the pay.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is not the way the statute reads at all. I have the statute before me, in which it speaks of the districts of Philadelphia, Baltimore, Buffalo, St. Louis, Louisville, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Boston, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, Huron, and Galena, $2,000 each. You seem to have taken Pittsburgh out of the Philadelphia, Baltimore, Buffalo, St. Louis class and put it in with these smaller ports like Point Pleasant, W. Va., and Bangor, Me., and give an increase of only $100. Does the gentleman think that is fair? It does not strike me that it is right, and I want to get information about it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it is fair. That is what the men directly affected say.

Mr. ROBBINS. I know that the port of Pittsburgh has many times more commerce than either of these two ports that I have suggested, and that there will be so much more work there.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I expect that every gentleman will become the champion of his port and will say that it is the best in the country. We realized that difficulty and we called it to the attention of the men in the service. They said they had undertaken to readjust the salaries themselves, each one having regard to his own port, and they gave it up in despair.

Mr. ROBBINS. Take the port of Mobile. You have increased that salary from $1,500 to $2,350, and you have increased the salary at the port of St. Louis from $1,500 to $2,350. Pittsburgh is a larger and more important port than St. Louis.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman will look at the table, he will find that Point Pleasant has just as much business as Pittsburgh.

Mr. ROBBINS. It could not have.

Mr. EDMONDS. Therefore they are classed together.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman is mistaken about the pay in the ports referred to. We have not increased the pay of inspectors in any port $850. The maximum increase is $600. We did not undertake to determine the relative importance of the ports, but based the increases on the pay the men are now receiving, and in that we had the approval of the men in the service themselves.

Mr. ROBBINS. You increase the salary at Pittsburgh only $100, and at San Francisco you increase the salary $700.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman is mistaken. The increases are equitable, based on their present pay, and is what they themselves agree to.

Mr. ROBBINS. I suggest that it is inequitable.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It would be impossible to balance all these equities.

There are 21 vacancies in the position of hull inspector in the Steamboat-Inspection Service. They have 13 temporary men in the service now, leaving 8 vacancies. There are 8 vacancies in the positions of boiler inspectors. Six temporary appointments have been made, leaving two vacancies. The men are leaving the service all the time on account of the meagerness of the pay and the inducements held out for higher pay in other services. Hence it is of the utmost importance that these increases of pay should be made if we expect to prevent the demoralization of the service. And when we call to mind that under the existing law the maximum pay is only $2,500 and the minimum pay only $1,500, and that we are only increasing the minimum to $2,100 and the maximum to $2,945, I am sure the committee will agree with me that we have been very careful not to make any other than very modest increases.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to incorporate as part of my remarks the following excerpts from the report made by Mr. N. Sumner Myrick to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. Mr. Myrick says:

EXHIBIT A.

Of all the members of the Steamboat-Inspection Service none are entitled to greater respect than the local inspectors, the clerks, and the assistant inspectors stationed at the various districts throughout the country, and none excite an equal degree of sympathy. Taken as a whole, the Government is nowhere served by a body of men who are more conscientious, zealous, or harder worked, or more inadequately compensated than are these servants of the inspection service. Most of the inspectors, as in the case of the supervisors, have had but little education, measured by the standard of the schools. But, as in the case of the supervisors, many of them have taught themselves to a proficiency in the technical side of their work that is as surprising as it is gratifying to realize. Some of them in fact have realized creditable results in authorship. Of course, nearly all of them have had large experience in navigation as masters, or with machinery and boilers as engineers, besides long training in the service as assistant inspectors. Their work is laborious in the extreme, continuing through more hours of the day than a labor unionist could easily locate by the clock, and if paid for at the union rates for overtime, would leave but little to be desired by them as to the compensation.

The multiplying duties of the local inspection force may be conceived of from a consideration of the new work made necessary by the seamen's act, the larger part of which devolves upon the locals.

For the improvement of the local inspection service many things need to be done. In the first place there should be an increase both in salaries and in numbers. The service, it can not be too frequently stated, is underpaid and greatly undermanned. Every man who enters the service as an assistant inspector should, and usually does, have a master's or chief engineer's certificate. The annual salaries paid assistants varies from $1,600 to $1,800, except at New York, where it is $2,000. Contrasting this compensation with that of $3,000 paid to masters and $2,100 to engineers of coastwise vessels, to $1,600 to $2,000 and a bonus paid to masters and engineers of ore boats, and to $2,500 and $3,000 paid to masters and $2,000 paid to engineers of package-freight boats on the Lakes for seven or eight months' service, it is as apparent that there is not much inducement for men of this class to enter the inspection service, as it is natural to expect that considerable difficulty should be experienced in obtaining for the force of assistants men of the proper experience and mental equipment.

That the conditions growing out of these circumstances affect other branches of the service will be realized when it is recalled that the local inspectors are recruited from the ranks of the assistants. It is not reasonable to expect a higher type of superior officer when the selection is thus limited. The surprising fact in this connection is that so large a percentage of the men reach so high an average of efficiency.

The personnel of the clerical force also is affected by the low rate of compensation and by insufficient numbers to perform the duties that are constantly increasing in volume and importance. Probably in no department of the Government is there a body of clerks that are so consistently worked beyond normal office hours as are the clerks in the Inspection Service. No private employer would exact an equal amount of excess labor without additional compensation. Some of these overworked men have been employed in the service for periods varying from 12 to 30 years, and are receiving salaries of only $1,200 to $1,500, the latter the maximum, while others earning much more than they are paid receive only $960.

In reference to this question of salaries, it is important to point out that from figures compiled in 1913, it appears that 38 local inspectors received less than the minimum salary paid to assistant inspectors, and that only 16 received more than the maximum paid assistant inspectors. Such inequalities in compensation are rarely to be found outside Government employment.

It is suggested that a revision in salaries be made and that the Supervising Inspector General be paid $5,000; the supervisors, $3,500; the chief clerk at Washington, $3,000; that the minimum salary to be paid clerks be fixed at $1,200 and the maximum at $2,000, to be paid all clerks having served 10 years, and that the salaries of those who have served less than 10 years be increased $100 per annum until the maximum is reached. It is further suggested that the salaries of local inspectors range from $2,000 to $3,000, and those of assistants from $1,500 to $2,000.

Changing conditions, involving a higher grade of intelligence and acquired knowledge of many complicated problems arising in connection with the increasing size in vessels and machinery, and varied life-saving equipment, without reference to other considerations, make reasonable this increase in compensation, and its reasonableness is made clearer when it is understood that the growing demand for capable men in the merchant service, and the increase in their compensation, will presently make it impossible to recruit the inspection service from their ranks, if the present rate of compensation is to be maintained. Again, if the need of some degree of technical proficiency in the assistant inspectors is admitted, and this seems to be necessary, especially in view of the enlarged merchant marine that the public mind has assumed is in process of development, the acquisition of qualified men will be much more difficult.

Mr. Chairman, I also wish to call attention to the following exhibit:

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE] 20 minutes.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to review briefly the history of steamboat inspection in this country. In 1838 the Congress of the United States passed the first act in reference to steamboat inspection and authorized the district judges at the various ports to appoint two inspectors for the inspection of each vessel. It called upon masters and owners of vessels to have their steamboats inspected once each year, and the universal custom grew up of allowing $5 to each one of these inspectors by the court for each inspection.

In 1852 another act was passed, which named the ports in the United States that were to have inspectors, and put two inspectors in each port, one an inspector of hulls and the other an inspector of boilers.

In 1871 a very comprehensive law was passed, fixing the salaries of all these inspectors in the various ports, changing them, reducing some and increasing others.

In 1895 a radical change was made in the inspection of steamboats, and from that time on the inspectors were paid in proportion to the number of vessels inspected in their ports. For instance, if less than 100 were inspected, each of the two inspectors were paid $1,200. If over 100 and less than 150 were inspected, the inspector was paid $1,500. If over 150 and less than 200 were inspected, each inspector was paid $1,800. From 200 vessels to 300, the inspectors were paid $2,000. From 300 to 500, the inspectors were paid $2,250. Over 500 vessels inspected, the inspectors were paid $2,500 each.

Now, this system had its faults, and its greatest fault was that there was a radical difference in the different ships in different ports. For instance, all the vessels in a port on the Mississippi would be river steamboats that would be very much alike and the machinery and boilers would be practically the same, while almost every boat in a seaport town like New York would be different. They not only would have different kinds of boilers but each ship would be of a different type, and they would have to inspect all foreign vessels taking passengers from the United States. That would make them take up the question of foreign-built steamboats with foreign-built power.

There was still another fault in the law of 1895—that it created a great temptation to defraud the Government; for instance, in a certain district where 99 vessels had been inspected, if they could inspect one more vessel they could raise the salary from $1,200 to $1,500 per annum. It was a terrible temptation, and it led in one particular case to the digging up of an old scow that had been sunk for years in order that they might inspect it.

So in 1905 a new act was passed, going back again to the salary system, and it established, with few exceptions, the salaries formerly paid.

In 1910 several new districts were created. Owing to our War with Spain we had to have a new district in Porto Rico, one in the Philippines, and a little later one was established in Tampa, Fla.

Let us for a moment refer to the personnel of this force. It is not large; it is very small. That is the reason they have not had a raise in a great many years. There are actually 226 people in the whole United States in the employment of this service. One of these has an office in Washington; the Supervising Inspector General is in charge of that office. He is the head of the service. He has one chief clerk. There are 10 supervising inspectors in the 10 different districts. For instance, there is at this time just one district on the Pacific coast, and that supervising inspector goes all the way from Alaska down the coast to southern California.

Mr. HADLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. I will.

Mr. HADLEY. The district of the Pacific coast includes all the territory west of the crest of the Rocky Mountains, south into the Pacific Ocean, to Hawaii, and north to Alaska.

Mr. ROWE. I thank the gentleman. There are 10 supervising inspectors who travel constantly, each covering his district. There are two traveling inspectors. It frequently becomes necessary for the supervising inspector, by reason of an accident or some irregularity in the work, to send out a traveling inspector. The Supervising Inspector General can not go all over the United States, for his office is in Washington, and somebody must be in charge there.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman stated that this supervising inspector general had but one clerk.

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Is it possible that there is really an office in Washington with only one clerk?

Mr. ROWE. That happens to be so in this particular.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I fear that the gentleman is mistaken in regard to the Steamboat-Inspection Service. There are a number of clerks carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—one clerk class 4, two clerks in class 3, one clerk in class 2, and one clerk in class 1—two at $1,000, two at $900, besides the chief clerk who receives a salary of $2,000, with perhaps an increase of salary to $3,000.

Mr. ROWE. The gentleman may be correct in the minor positions, but I took this from the head of the department. I think these could hardly be called a part of the service. They are not permanent employees, but are there temporarily as bookkeepers and stenographers.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is in error, these clerks have been carried on the rolls for years. The gentleman is confused in his telephonic communication by the fact that in the service throughout the country there is but one clerk attached to each office.

Mr. ROWE. The gentleman is in part correct. There are bookkeepers and stenographers.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not in error. The force I have referred to is on the permanent rolls in Washington.

Mr. ROWE. But they have no authority in the Inspection Service.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; but the gentleman's colleague, Mr. PLATT, asked if there was an office in Washington that had only one clerk and the gentleman said yes, and I am controverting that.

Mr. ROWE. There are 48 inspection districts in 48 ports of the United States. Each one has two local inspectors—first, an inspector of hulls, and, second, an inspector of boilers. There is besides that a force known as assistant inspectors. For instance, in all of the large ports of the United States, like Boston, New York, Philadelphia, San Francisco, Buffalo, and many other large ports, there are assistant inspectors. The local board in smaller districts does the inspection of vessels and in large districts the assistant inspectors do most of it. New York, I think, is the only one where the local board makes no inspections. There the board sits constantly as a court. All accidents, as where two vessels collide, must be brought before the local board. Then it takes care of all trouble about engineers and masters of vessels. All such questions are tried before the local board. It licenses engineers and masters of vessels and all other officers of vessels, so that the local board in New York has all it can do as a court and is sitting constantly and does not inspect vessels.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it not a part of their duty also, not only to inspect hulls and boilers but to enforce the provisions of the seamen's act and see that vessels are properly equipped with wireless and properly manned, that every lifeboat and every life-saving equipment is provided according to the requirements of the law?

Mr. ROWE. The gentleman is correct, and I want to thank him for adding that, for I might have failed to mention it. These 226 men are all civil-service appointees. They have to pass an examination, but before they come up for examination they have to show a long service in the steamboat line. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], if he is reading the testimony, will find there is a difference in qualification for the inspector, and a very great difference in the examination he has to pass as to whether he seeks a position in a seaport town or in an inland port. He must have had five years experience at sea before he can enter an examination. He must have held the position of a master or the mate of a vessel or the chief engineer or the assistant engineer of large vessels. He must have had experience, years of experience at sea, before he is qualified to take the examination. This examination is a very difficult examination, and while many undertake it only few pass. It takes seven or eight days to take the examination. They are a very high grade of men. Every member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries was impressed with the character of the men in this service.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. I observe that the inspectors of hulls and the inspectors of boilers, for instance, at the port of New York, who are now receiving $2,000, are increased in compensation to $2,950.

Mr. ROWE. The gentleman is mistaken. The $2,000 men are raised to $2,450.

Mr. GOOD. Reading from page 4—

> The inspector of hulls and the inspector of boilers in the districts and ports enumerated in the preceding paragraph shall be entitled to the following salaries, to be paid under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, namely:
> For the port of New York, N. Y., at the rate of $2,950 per year for each local inspector.

Mr. ROWE. They receive now $2,500. There are two such men in the port of New York. Their salaries were fixed in 1895.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Why is that $2,950?

Mr. ROWE. They are raised $450 a year.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The figures $2,500 are stricken out and $2,950 inserted.

Mr. ROWE. Which bill has the gentleman?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am reading for the Senate bill.

Mr. ROWE. The Senate bill is $2,900, and it is $2,950 in the House bill.

Mr. GOOD. For the district of Philadelphia, in the next paragraph, you provide that the rate of pay shall be $2,750.

Mr. ROWE. Yes. These men are now receiving $2,250.

Mr. GOOD. And in the next paragraph you provide for $2,500, and those men are now receiving $1,600, are they not?

Mr. ROWE. No; they are now receiving $2,000.

Mr. GOOD. What I want to inquire of the gentleman from New York is this: As I recall, we have added during the past three years about 50 to this force. That is, we have increased the appropriation by about $100,000, have we not?

M. ROWE. When?

Mr. GOOD. During the past four years.

Mr. ROWE. I do not think you have increased it a dollar except for the new districts at Porto Rico and Honolulu and at Tampa, Fla.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In the appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the number of inspectors was increased five or six.

Mr. GOOD. Since 1912 has not the number been very largely increased?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think not.

Mr. GOOD. The increase has been in assistant inspectors.

Mr. ROWE. No; there have not been increases in the number of assistant inspectors.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There can not be any increase except as they are authorized by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GOOD. I call attention to the fact——

Mr. ALEXANDER. We do not increase the number; the number is determined by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GOOD. In 1915 the appropriation for assistant inspectors, and so forth, was $353,600. Last year there was appropriated $434,100, with a supplemental deficiency appropriation of $2,250, so the increase was about $100,000 in three years, which increase went to pay the salaries of more assistant inspectors.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have not followed that up because those matters are determined by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GOOD. So there is an increase in the salary of assistant inspectors——

Mr. ROWE. Yes; averaging about $400 or $450 each.

Mr. GOOD. That is what I wanted to ask the gentleman about. My recollection is that the superintendent or the Secretary of Commerce testified that he was having no difficulty in employing men at this service but was having some difficulty in retaining men at the salaries, because the various activities of the Government elsewhere were calling them from that service.

Mr. ROWE. I will answer that question by reading a letter from the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, Acting Secretary while the Secretary of Commerce was on the Pacific coast:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, April 16, 1918.

Hon. F. W. ROWE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ROWE: I am taking the liberty of writing you urging prompt consideration of your bill increasing the pay of the inspectors of the Steamboat-Inspection Service. My reason for doing this is that conditions in the service are becoming bad owing to resignations of local inspectors and the inability of the department to find suitable men to take their places. These resignations are all due to the fact that the salary is comparatively small and the men resigning have been offered more lucrative positions elsewhere. From July 1 to December 31, 1917, 12 inspectors resigned; from January 1 to February 28, 1918, 5 inspectors resigned. Nine of these positions are now filled by temporary appointments and eight of them are filled permanently from the list of civil service eligibles. From March 1 to April 15, 1918, 14 inspectors resigned, 12 of whom were hull inspectors. No eligibles are available and the department has been unable to find any men to fill these places. This shows the trend, and unless some remedy is soon found—and the only one that I know of is the passage of your bill—we will probably lose more men in the immediate future.

As you well know, the bureau operates under great difficulties with its present force, being compelled to continually switch men from one place to another, in order that the work may be kept up. This is especially so at this time of the year, when navigation on the Great Lakes is opening up. Fourteen vacancies constitute a large hole in the service and necessarily cripple it to a great extent. If any more vacancies occur and we are unable to fill them, it will be utterly impossible to keep the work up to that standard of efficiency which has been maintained heretofore and which the department is so desirous of maintaining.

Thanking you in advance, and with kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours, very truly,

A. L. THURMAN,
Acting Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes additional.

Mr. ROWE. There are only 212 inspectors all told.

Mr. GOOD. Let me ask the gentleman at this point: When this bill was drawn, was it not the gentleman's intention and the intention of the committee reporting it that the salaries fixed in the bill should be the only salaries or compensation they should be paid by the Government?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. To-day we approved the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, carrying the salaries for these men next year, and that bill provides that any Government official or employee who receives a salary of $2,500 or less shall receive in addition thereto $120 a year. The gentleman did not intend that they should receive this salary and in addition the $120 a year that has been placed on the legislative bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will allow me to answer that question, I will say no; and if it is necessary to prevent that from being done, we will accept an amendment to this bill to that effect, but at the time this bill was under consideration we did not know what provisions would be in the legislative bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is there anything in the work of an assistant inspector at New York differing from the work of an assistant inspector anywhere else in the United States, so as to justify the man in New York receiving $2,500 a year and the man working at San Francisco $2,350, and the rest of them doing that kind of work elsewhere $2,100? In other words, why is not the kind of work performed in this service in the United States the same, and should not the compensation be the same?

Mr. ROWE. No; the work is not the same.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Why?

Mr. ROWE. The compensation should not be the same. Does the gentleman think if he worked, for instance, in Duluth, with the expenses of a city the size of Duluth, he should have the same wages that he would have if he worked in the city of New York?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman certainly is not going to make the statement here that living in the city of New York is higher than in the Western States?

Mr. ROWE. It is higher than in any city in the Union; much higher even than in Washington.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am not willing to believe that.

Mr. ROWE. I have lived in New York for 31 years, and I know.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If you are going to grade these salaries according to expenses of living in the various places, then we will have to have a commission to go out and find out the cost of living and how it changes from month to month and year to year.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. I would like to answer the gentleman from Minnesota, and then I will yield to my colleague from New York. Just let me answer in Gen. Uhler's own words:

He says:

In New York the local inspectors are responsible for the inspection and the certificating, first, of the little steam water boat that goes around the harbor carrying water to the ships; the tugboat, the large tugboat, the big seagoing tug of 700 or 800 tons, which is as large as the ships that I was in at one time; freight boats, passenger boats, ferry boats, our own coastwise steamers, like that one shown on the wall [indicating] until you get up to the big steamers like those of the Hamburg-American, or the North German Lloyd, or the Netherlands Line.

Now, they have to be practically conversant with all the conditions that apply to those different classes of vessels, in order that they may pass judgment upon appeals, upon whether or not the local inspectors have been right in this or in that ruling.

Another point in that connection is this: In a great district like New York, and a great harbor like New York, there are scarcely four days in the month that that board of inspectors is not there, sitting at a table like this [indicating] hearing testimony in a case of collision, or of some disaster, or some calamity. They have got to be perfectly familiar with the conditions that apply to navigation on these ships [indicating picture on wall], and on ships like the Hamburg-American, the North German Lloyd, and the Netherlands Line, or our own ships. They have got to be familiar with the situation that tugs get into; they have got to be familiar with the conditions that a ferryboat and a tug may get into, which bring about a collision, so that they may intelligently pass upon those things.

I have considered all of those things, and while the same qualifications are required for entry into the service, they have ten times as many problems to meet in New York, probably, as they do in any other part of this country.

Now, the qualifications of the man for inspector at Buffalo or on the Great Lakes or on inland rivers or lakes are not the same as for the seaport on the Atlantic or Pacific.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have observed that the inspection at New York City last year in round numbers covered a tonnage of 1,825,000. At this work there were 30 assistant inspectors, and, of course, two inspectors, making 32 in all, or on the average for each one, about 57,000 tons. That is less work than is done anywhere else in the United States per man, as the record in the hearings show.

Mr. ROWE. There is a great difference between inspecting a Great Lakes freight boat, admirable as it is, and inspecting an ocean-going steamer.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Just how many of those great ocean-going steamers are there?

Mr. ROWE. All passenger boats must be inspected four times a year.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There are not as many as go out of the city of Duluth in one day.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask right here, was it not testified to by the men interested that they have tried to find out all the equities, and that this bill came as near as they could make it—that is, the Steamboat-Inspection Service, Gen. Uhler, and Mr. Hoover—and that they had presented it in the most equitable shape they could?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman also knows that these men are responsible for the inspection of the local passenger steamers that carry excursionists back and forth, and that in New York there is a tremendous amount of that traffic going on almost every day in the year.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. And I would like to know if there is not a great deal required of them on account of collisions?

Mr. ROWE. All of that has to be taken into consideration in New York Harbor. There are more accidents there than in any other harbor in the United States.

Mr. PLATT. I would like to know if you could not squeeze out another $50 and make it $3,000 for these salaries?

Mr. ROWE. We will give the gentleman a chance in a few moments to make it $2,950 instead of $2,900 as in the Senate bill.

Mr. PLATT. Why not make it $3,000?

Mr. ROWE. It was more than that when the bill was presented, but the committee, in their judgment, reduced it to $2,950.

Mr. PLATT. That is pretty small cheeseparing for a Nation like this.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to know if you have made a computation to ascertain how much the total increase is that is carried by this bill per annum?

Mr. ROWE. I do not exactly know. Does the chairman know that? I think it is between $112,000 and $115,000 a year.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Here is another thing I want to ask. I observe that the original act, in section 4404, provided, in taking care of the expenses, that the inspector should have his actual and reasonable expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. He should have his actual and reasonable traveling expenses. However, that has been changed by the committee, and the language now is "actual necessary traveling expenses." Why this change? Why not permit it to remain as it was in the original act, "actual and reasonable"?

Mr. ROWE. They require them to make a certificate of just what they spend and where they spend it and to itemize the account. The Merchant Marine Committee thought the language of the bill preferable.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. According to the original act they had to make a certificate.

Mr. ROWE. Originally they were allowed when traveling 10 cents per mile and later 5 cents per mile, and by a later act they were allowed what they actually spent.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And you say the persons who are in favor of this bill objected to the language "and reasonable"?

Mr. ROWE. The committee wanted the other words. Now, I would like to say just one word before sitting down——

Mr. ALEXANDER. In that connection, a gentleman asked the question as to what the increase would be, and I understood the gentleman from New York to say between $112,000 and $115,000. In this bill there are 255 employees, and the present number of employees is 238. Now, the proposed number of employees will be 255, according to this statement, and the total increase in the pay for all will be $142,150.

Mr. ROWE. I thank the gentleman. The chairman of the committee is no doubt correct.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There is another question I intended to ask. What became of the inspector of hulls and the inspector of boilers at the inspection districts of Galena and Wheeling? Have those been omitted by amendatory legislation of the original act? I observe in the original act there were the inspection districts of Galena and Wheeling. They are not in this act. What has happened to them?

Mr. ROWE. I will have to refer that to our chairman.

Mr. PLATT. There used to be a navy in Switzerland?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The interjection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] is uncalled for and unnecessary. It does not answer the question at all. I would like to have some information on this if I can get it.

Mr. ROWE. There are no such districts in the present law.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to refer very briefly to a few letters which I have received. There are only one or two which I wish to read in full. These letters are all from men not now in the service, but who have left within the last 12 months. But I should first state that there were 36 resignations in 10 months ending April 30, 1918. One-sixth of all the inspectors resigned in 10 months to take more lucrative positions. I want to read this one in full; it is very brief.

S. S. "ALCORN."
New Orleans, La., March 28, 1918.

Hon. F. W. ROWE,
United States Representative, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Referring to House of Representatives bill No. 9908, I beg to state I left the Steamboat-Inspection Service to accept a position paying a much larger salary. I held a temporary appointment as local inspector of hulls at Galveston, Tex. The salary was $125 a month with a 5 per cent increase, making a total of $131.25, out of which I had to pay all living expenses. I resigned on account of inadequate salary and accepted a position as master of the steamer Alcor at a salary of $275 a month, with a 25 per cent bonus while engaged in coastwise trade, making a salary of $343.75 a month, with board and lodging furnished.

Respectfully, yours, JAMES F. DECKER.

Remember, gentlemen, these people have to be of the grade of masters. Most of them have been masters. The new salary is considerably more than twice the salary he was receiving in the service.

One feature about this loss to the Steamboat-Inspection Service is that other services have been hiring men to do exactly the same work. Here is a man hired under the Shipping Board. His name is V. E. Wright, of Mystic, Conn. I will not read his letter, but he says he was receiving $1,500 as an inspector in the United States Steamboat-Inspection Service, and is now doing the same kind of work for $2,200 at Hog Island for the Shipping Board.

Here is a letter from Joseph T. Drake, of Boston, Mass. His salary was $1,890. He says:

I am now doing good war service here by preparing men for navigators and am turning out from four to eight every week, with prospects of continual increase. It is rather difficult to estimate my financial prospects, but I feel sure of not less than $5,000 per year, with a possibility of nearly doubling that.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman referred a while ago to many persons leaving the service. I wondered whether the character of the work is such that there must be such a training for it that it will be difficult to fill the places when they leave it.

Mr. ROWE. It is exceedingly difficult. They are put on as temporary inspectors. Something like 12 in the service now are temporary men, but these men must pass the civil service, and they must have been either a master or a mate on a vessel in order to be a hull inspector. They must have been an engineer or assistant engineer on a big steamer to be an inspector of boilers; and men are not qualified until they are about 30 or 35 years old to fill these positions.

Mr. FESS. So that the claim for increase is not simply in behalf of individuals, but also on behalf of the service?

Mr. ROWE. Yes. The service is crippled to-day. They have never been so short of men as they are now.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. The country is needing generally many masters and mates, and the ordinary master and mate gets a salary above that of these officers, does he not?

Mr. ROWE. Yes. I will read another letter. Here is a man who has gone to the American Line. This man was receiving $2,250. His name is B. B. Whitney, of Seattle, Wash. He now receives $4,000. Let me read:

AMERICAN BUREAU OF SHIPPING,
Seattle, Wash., May 15, 1918.

Mr. H. M. MCLARIN,
President National Federation of Federal Employees, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of May 9, 1918, duly came to hand, and in reply I have to state that I know that the steamboat-inspection officers are a lot of high-grade men who are grossly underpaid for the very important service rendered, and I sincerely hope that Congress will soon give them just compensation for their services.

I left the service because the salary, absurdly small in normal times, was absolutely inadequate to meet obligations in these abnormal times. I received as local inspector the princely sum of $2,250 per year for standing responsible for the seaworthiness of vessels of all sorts and the qualifications of the officers who navigate them, and who, as masters of some vessels, received nearly twice as much. Officers of the Steamboat-Inspection Service are held responsible also for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of steam vessels, and therefore must see that they are stanchly built, properly equipped, adequately manned, and officered by competent men, and are paid about the same as longshoremen who load and unload the cargo with no responsibilities beyond the breakage of packages and the economical stowage. The supervising inspector general with his sterling integrity and his exceptional abilities and with responsibilities beyond those of any other public officer is rewarded with a salary which is less than one-half what it should be.

I am now receiving $4,000 per year for the same kind of service that I rendered the Government, and do not have half the worries that local inspectors are burdened with. I sincerely hope that officers of the Steamboat-Inspection Service will get their just dues.

Yours, very truly,

B. B. WHITNEY,
Surveyor to American Bureau of Shipping
(Formerly local inspector, Seattle district).

A local inspector is subject at any time to be arrested. If any vessel goes to the bottom, the last man who inspected that vessel is liable to be arrested. You gentlemen all remember that incident in Chicago, where United States inspectors were led through the city of Chicago handcuffed, and yet they were found later not to have been responsible. Their inspection was perfect. Yet they were arrested. Any inspector in the service is liable to arrest at any time. Here is a letter from George F. Waite, who is now receiving $3,300 at Hog Island under the Shipping Board. His former salary was $2,000.

This letter from Capt. M. Walls, of Buffalo, N. Y., states that when in the Steamboat-Inspection Service he received $2,000, and that he is now a captain, with a salary of $3,600 and a bonus of $400.

He gets, you will observe, $4,000 instead of $2,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will my friend yield again?

Mr. ROWE. With pleasure.

Mr. FESS. I am in sympathy with what the gentleman wants to do in this bill, but it would not be safe, would it, to use the scale of salaries that Hog Island is now paying under the Shipping Board?

Mr. ROWE. No; it would not. We have not reached those figures at all. We passed a bill here on June 5 in reference to the qualifications of inspectors of steam boilers on railroads. The chief of that service was receiving prior to that time a salary of $4,000. Under our bill that we passed without opposition here, although some questions were asked, he gets $5,000. The two assistant inspectors in his office—clerks, so to speak—got $3,000, and now they are to get under that bill $4,000. The 50 district inspectors were to get $1,800 each. They are now raised to $3,000, a raise of $1,200. The highest raise in this bill is $1,000 to two men, but so far as inspectors are concerned the raise is about $500.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ROWE. I hate to take up so much time, but many questions have been asked me, so that a great deal of my time has been taken in answering questions. Here is a letter from Mr. Winslow D. Conn, of San Francisco, who is getting $1,800 a year as an inspector. He does not write me that he has left, but he speaks especially of other people. He says that Capt. Cecil Brown, one of the traveling inspectors under the Government, was drawing $2,500 and is now drawing $3,600. He tells of others, whom I have not the time to mention. They are mostly on the Pacific coast, from San Francisco to Seattle, where many have left the service.

Here is a letter from D. A. Curran, of Cleveland, Ohio, who was drawing $1,600. He is now drawing $2,000 under an agreement that in six months he will receive $2,500 from the American Bureau of Shipping. That is a good standard. They do not pay more than a man is worth.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what the American Bureau of Shipping is?

Mr. ROWE. It is an inspection service used largely by insurance companies and others. It answers the purpose in this country of Lloyd's in England.

Next is a letter from Mr. Butler, of Cleveland, Ohio. He has been receiving as inspector $1,600 and in his new position is to receive $2,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes; I yield to the chairman of our committee.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have taken very great interest in developing our American Bureau of Shipping, because I think we ought to have an American Lloyd's. Mr. Stevenson Taylor is the president of the American Bureau of Shipping. Referring to this bill under date of January 16, 1918, he wrote me:

AMERICAN BUREAU OF SHIPPING,
New York, January 16, 1918.

Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER,
Chairman Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having had a great many years' experience with the Steamboat-Inspection Service, now under the Department of Commerce, I have felt for a long time that they are very much underpaid, and I am writing to ask your support of H. R. 4286, which proposes to remedy this matter.

In this connection let me say that I have had many occasions to confer with not only the Supervising Inspector General but with the supervising inspectors of two or three of the districts and locals besides, and when I consider that the American Bureau of Shipping, for instance, is now paying its surveyors from $2,000 to $6,000 per annum, I feel that comparatively the Steamboat-Inspection surveyors are receiving entirely too little pay for the quality of service demanded.

Our $2,000 men above mentioned are taken on probation and in six months receive $2,500 per annum, and during the past year we have been compelled (pleasantly compelled) to increase the salaries in order that we should keep the good men. With sincere regards, I am

Yours, very truly,

STEVENSON TAYLOR, President.

Mr. ROWE. I thank the chairman of the committee for reading that letter. There has been some question about the wages of these men, and I should like to state to you briefly what has happened. I know more about the port of New York than I do about other ports. In the port of New York there are two inspectors who now receive $2,500, and they are to be raised to $2,950; but there are 30 local inspectors in the port of New York who receive $2,000 each. Their salaries were fixed in 1878 at exactly that figure, and that is what they receive to-day. Two of the men who appeared before us have been over 16 years in the port of New York drawing salaries of $2,000 each. They are to be raised by this bill to $2,500. The salaries of the assistant inspectors at the ports of New Orleans and Philadelphia were fixed in 1895. There have been no changes worth mentioning in the salaries since 1895. There have been, however, three or four new ports where the salaries have been fixed recently. More than half of them have not been changed in over 40 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ROWE. When this war began in Europe four years ago we were building in this country about 250,000 tons of new shipping a year. This year our product will be between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 tons. Every vessel of this kind must be inspected. It can not take either passengers or freight until it is certificated by our inspectors. The inspectors of all these other services have their uses perhaps, but the vessel must be finally passed upon by our own United States inspectors.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Are we increasing the number of inspectors in proportion to the increases in the output of shipping?

Mr. ROWE. No; nothing like that; but we have authorized in this bill an increase of assistant inspectors to care for this new work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him in the statement he just made?

Mr. ROWE. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the current legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act reported a year ago, providing the salaries for assistant steamboat inspectors, the committee granted an increase of 12 additional to the force then provided for. In the bill that we reported this year, which finally passed the House to-day, we provided for an increase of 14, or every assistant inspector asked for by the department. So the gentleman is not quite correct in his statement.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the law the Congress may provide for an increase in the number of local inspectors or assistant inspectors as the service may require. The number is not limited in the law.

Mr. ROWE. The gentleman is correct.

Let me read one more letter, although I have taken too much of your time. This is a day of inspection, and this service has to do with the necessities of the hour. A few days ago we read about the torpedoing of the oil tanker Herbert L. Pratt. The man who inspected that ship in San Francisco, Cal., after it was completed has written me this letter:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., June 5, 1918.

Hon. FREDERICK ROWE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I had occasion to address a letter to you on May 29 last regarding the status of affairs in the Steamboat-Inspection Service, in which you have shown such a kind and considerate interest, particularly as to legislation designed to increase the pay of this hard-worked service.

The reason for this letter arises from the reports received two days ago about the activities of the enemy submarines on the Atlantic coast.

Among the vessels reported attacked and sunk was the oil tanker Herbert L. Pratt, and I desire to relate a circumstance regarding the inspection of that vessel which has an interest at this moment in illustrating the surpassing need of this service at this time more than ever.

At the final examination of this vessel by my associate and myself we found, as is always the circumstance at new vessels, all the interested parties awaiting our inspection of and decision as to the equipment, and as we are directed by statute to perform this function, no one else examines the equipment with care like that which we bestow upon it, because all hands know that we are going to test it and pass on its suitability.

Now, this is what we found and rectified as to the lifeboat equipment on this vessel, viz:

1. Oars much too short and light for a boat of this size and which were useless for the purpose intended.
2. Masts too large in diameter, never having been fitted to the boats, and which could not be stepped into position.
3. Yards too long and heavy for the sail, and which experienced sailors endeavored to rig in our presence and were unable to do so owing to its being too long.

Now, all this equipment was provided in the boats, and as these faults described were such that they could not be discovered except by actual test and which a superficial examination would not show and in trusting to the methods of buying equipment in these rush times the defects would not have been discovered until too late, or when the crew would be trying to use the sails or oars in mid-ocean and with no means to rectify the defects.

Now, the crew of this vessel, in all probability, did have to abandon ship and take to these boats, and, thanks to the thorough work of our inspectors and their experienced judgment, when the supreme moment of actual test arrived and this crew stepped into these boats they found them seaworthy and properly equipped, and thus these men had a fair chance against the elements.

In speaking of this I am speaking for all, for I know the conscientious manner in which our inspectors perform their work.

Now, the ordinary perils of the sea are sufficient to call for the best that is in us to protect the traveling public and the men who follow the sea for their livelihood, and the manner in which we have done our work can be shown by referring to the reports of the Supervising Inspector General, where can be noted the small number of preventable casualties that have occurred in the past.

But now the enemy submarine comes and adds to the other dangers of the sea, and the necessity of our inspection will never be questioned by anyone who has passed through the ordeal of being torpedoed and found himself in a seaworthy and properly equipped lifeboat.

In addition to the names given you in the last letter of inspectors that had left the service for more lucrative employment, these also resigned within a year: Messrs. Whitney, Jordan, Shields, and Marshall, all of the Seattle office.

Yours, very respectfully, WINSLOW D. CONN,
Assistant Inspector of Boilers,
San Francisco, Cal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does he refer to the masts of the ship or to the masts of the lifeboats?

Mr. ROWE. The masts of the lifeboats. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert the letters that I have referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Thirty-four Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HASTINGS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill S. 2104, found itself without a quorum, whereupon the roll was called and 270 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a question of policy confronts the House in the consideration of this bill—whether we should launch piecemeal upon an increase of salary of any of our higher-paid officials. If we should adopt the policy in these times of war of increasing the salary of the higher-paid officials, then I suggest to the House that a committee ought to be appointed to go over the salary list of all the officials and increase them according to the changed conditions.

There is no denying that the salaries of most of the higher-paid officials are out of joint with the existing conditions, both in industrial and commercial life, and yet up to the present time it has been the policy of Congress not to increase the salaries of these higher-paid officials. This afternoon the Congress adopted a conference report that sought to give some increase of salary based upon the increased cost of living to all those employees of the Government who have a lower salary than $2,500. It raised the limit of those who received the increase last year from $1,800 to $2,500, granting to all who receive $2,500 and under an increase of $120.

Now, the committee comes here and singles out for preferment only one branch. You can go through the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and find hundreds of instances where there is just as much warrant for increasing the pay of the higher-paid officials as there is in this instance. No one denies that the head of the Steamboat-Inspection Service is a competent official, but no one denies also that when you increase his salary from $4,000 to $5,000 you do an injustice to the Assistant Secretaries of War, who in these times are charged with a hundredfold more responsibility than is the Chief of the Steamboat-Inspection Service.

Yet they receive only $4,500. Take the case of the pay of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury. They receive but $5,000, I believe. All down the line you can pick out officials whose salaries should be increased, where the men filling those positions are performing service that in private employment would demand twice, three times, and, in some instances, four times the salary they are receiving from the Government. But a practical situation confronted Congress upon our entering the war—whether we should undertake a general increase of salaries of all these officials, and up to the present time, for reasons of economy, for reasons of patriotism, for reasons of necessity, it was concluded not to pursue that policy.

If we attempted it in one instance it could be used with equal force as an argument in every instance. That is the question before the House. It is one of policy. No one denies that these officials should have an increase in salary, if you are going to compare their salaries with what they were receiving under conditions that prevailed before we entered the war.

As far as the assistant inspectors are concerned, they constitute the great bulk of this force of 255 men. I believe there are but 13 men all told who are not assistant inspectors. Every one of those assistant inspectors will receive the increase allowance of $120 provided in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which we passed this morning. Personally, I did not think that $120 was adequate as an increase, and in the committee I favored an increase of $150, thinking that was more commensurate with conditions, but Congress has fixed it at $120. What do you do here? You say to this branch of the service that $120 is not sufficient and by this bill you are going to increase their salaries four or five hundred dollars. How unfair that is to the hundreds and thousands of employees in other branches of the service performing work of a similar kind, who will receive but $120. Of course, no one will deny the contention that many of these men have resigned, by reason of the competition in industrial life, from their present positions. Instances have been cited of their going to Hog Island. Hog Island has not only withdrawn men from the Government service, but there is instance after instance where outlandish salaries have been paid to employees who came from private shipbuilding plants. In fact, the New York shipbuilding plant, across the way from Hog Island, in Camden, was alsot crippled because of the wages offered their employees by the owners of the Hog Island plant. They did more by that method to demoralize shipbuilding than to increase it. That is the rule always, however.

Men of high qualification will take positions in public employment—post-office inspectors, for instance—and along comes some private concern that finds a particular man is more valuable in some private capacity, and he is offered an increase of $500 or $1,000 over what the Government is paying him. Naturally he leaves the Government employment. He has special qualifications that fit him for some higher grade of employment. While there are only 12 vacancies in this branch to-day, that is nothing exceptional. We provided 12 additional assistant inspectors in the appropriation bill for the present fiscal year, and we are providing 14 more in the bill passed to-day.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We are launching now about 250,000 tons, dead weight, of vessels every month, and Mr. Schwab is quoted as saying that by the 1st of August we will launch 500,000 tons a month. I doubt very much if you have provided the necessary increase for the next year.

Mr. STAFFORD. If we have not provided for the necessary increase then the fault lies with the Secretary of Commerce and not with the Committee on Appropriations, because the committee granted every individual asked for by the Secretary of Commerce in the estimates of this year. We recognize the need of additional employees, and we granted them completely. If not enough have been provided then it rests upon the Secretary of Commerce to go before the subcommittee having in charge the deficiency appropriation bill and ask for more.

The subcommittee having in charge the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill can not be charged with delinquency in not providing an adequate force as recommended by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. ALEXANDER. What I said was not in the spirit of criticism at all. I simply expressed a doubt that enough employees had been added to meet the increase in tonnage.

Mr. STAFFORD. I might agree with the gentleman, because when the Chief of the Bureau of Steamboat Inspection came before the committee he justified this demand for an increase in assistant inspectors upon the ground of additional tonnage to be placed on the ocean under the American flag.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman attach any weight to a recommendation of the Secretary of Commerce with reference to the increase in these salaries?

Mr. STAFFORD. As to the recommendation for an increase in salary, I pointed out, while the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] had the floor, that for years past the Secretary of Commerce has asked for an increase of $1,000 in the compensation of the chief of this bureau, from $4,000 to $5,000, as is carried in the report of this committee. But this year, as I am reliably informed, following the decision of the administration not to increase the salaries of any of these highly paid officials, and for the first time in many years, in the Book of Estimates which I have before me he did not recommend any increase in the salary of the chief of the bureau or of the chief clerk.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ROWE. The gentleman has been on the Committee on Appropriations for a great many years and I would like to know if he knows of any other employees whose work has been very much increased who are now receiving the same salary that the office paid in 1895.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes. I cited all of the Assistant Secretaries of War and the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury; all of the employees of the Treasury Department; the post-office inspectors. There are some 200 or more of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] to yield me some time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. STAFFORD. Five minutes, I suppose, will be sufficient.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a pretty weak argument when you are singling out this one class for preferential consideration and singling it out to the extent of $500 per man, whereas you give to the other men in the service but $120. That is the objection to it. With a general bill providing for all the officials and employees of the service, the only criticism that could be lodged against it would be that at this time it would be ill-advised to make a general increase of salaries, but here you are singling out one particular class and increasing salaries in this extravagant manner. Certainly you do not wish to increase the chief of the bureau a thousand dollars and deny a similar increase to the Assistant Secretaries of War. Why, the Assistant Secretaries of War, I dare say, in private life, before they accepted the positions, were receiving $10,000 a year, and men down in the various new activities of the Government receiving salaries of only $2,000 to $2,500 gave up positions drawing from $5,000 to $8,000 in many instances as a patriotic duty. But here you come along and say, "No, in this special branch of the service we will adopt a different rule of providing salaries commensurate with the increased cost of living and what is being paid in private establishments and single out one special class for preferential consideration."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The other day a bill was reported to the House and passed without question increasing the pay of the chief inspector of boilers in the railroad service from $4,000 to $5,000, and 2 assistant inspectors from $3,000 to $4,000, and 50 assistants from $1,800 to $3,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say that I can agree to the position of the gentleman in one particular, that we passed the bill. Out of deference to my feeble efforts in opposing that bill I can not say that it passed without question, because I would have to acknowledge an inconsistent position if I stated that. I rose on the floor of this House at that time and pointed out that I recognized the futility of attempting to defeat a bill that had the support of the Railroad Brotherhood of Engineers. I pointed out from the hearings on that bill that in private employment these very inspectors were receiving $2,000 to $2,750 a year, but the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce brought in a bill increasing the compensation from $1,800 to $3,000, which was not even justified, as shown from the hearings. All you can do in these times is to point out inequities, and if the House seeks to follow wildly the recommendations of the committee and show favoritism no more can be done. I am doing my simple duty and saying that it is not right to single out one class of individuals. We ought to have, gentlemen, as soon as this war is over, a committee appointed to go over this whole question of equalization of salaries, so that the various officials and the various employees will receive a salary based upon the responsibilities of the work as it exists to-day.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time, if I have any.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and they are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4402. That there shall be a supervising inspector general, who shall be appointed from time to time by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be selected with reference to his fitness and ability to systematize and carry into effect all the provisions of law relating to the Steamboat-Inspection Service, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $5,000 a year and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business assigned him by competent authority, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there is only one section of the bill and there are several paragraphs, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be read by paragraph and not by section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the bill be read by paragraph for amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, page 2, line 3, the figures "$5,000" and insert "$4,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think it is the day after to-morrow that the people of this country are to be called upon to subscribe to their utmost to what is known as the war-saving stamp campaign, and I am wondering if the people having that campaign in charge did not make an error in not having incorporated in the posters which we see in every hamlet and town throughout the country appealing to the people to buy war-savings stamps, a statement to the effect that $122,000 or thereabouts of the sum which will be received from that campaign will be devoted to increasing salaries in the Department of Commerce in this particular bureau. What an inspiration, what a stimulation that would be to the people of this country. How they would be encouraged to come forward and buy these stamps if they only knew by official proclamation that these funds were to be devoted to this particular purpose. Ah, Mr. Chairman, it would seem the war needs of this country, the legitimate war needs, are of such tremendous size and running into such stupendous figures that we ought to stop right here when propositions are made to increase salaries, particularly of the higher-paid officials of this Government.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has pointed out that the chief of this particular bureau would receive more than an Assistant Secretary of War. He would receive more than the Commissioner of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. Now, I have no criticism——

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman does not mean that last statement, does he?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. ALEXANDER. He receives $5,000.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is talking about the director. I am talking about the commissioner. I said he would receive more than the Commissioner of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. I do not mean to criticize the head of this very important department. He is a very efficient servant. He has been there a long time, practically since the Department of Commerce was created by act of Congress, and he has put this particular bureau upon a very efficient footing; but I submit that to those gentlemen who are getting $4,000 in these serious times that it is patriotic and proper that they should be willing to wait until after this war is over before they come in here and expect the Congress to jump their salaries $1,000 at a clip. If the chief clerk of this bureau is worth more money, he is entitled to a moderate increase, but I submit he is not entitled to an increase of $1,000. I was very much interested in listening to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE], who explained the history and importance of this important bureau very carefully and very thoroughly and showed a keen insight into its work.

Both of these gentlemen perform a very important work, but every department of this Government can come in here and make an equally persuasive appeal to have their salaries raised. The Bureau of Navigation, the Bureau of Commerce, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the various other bureaus and other departments of the Government can show that some of their men are resigning, that the high salaries in private employment are enticing them away, and they can make an argument equally persuasive as that made in this case. But I submit we ought not to be swayed by this appeal at this particular time, and that we ought not to establish the precedent here of saying to the $4,000 employee of the United States Government, "All you have to do is to ask for an increase and Congress will grant it," because, Mr. Chairman, we will establish the precedent by this legislation. And the days of adjournment of this session are in the somewhat distant future, and you will see the pressure being brought to bear by letters and appeals, and you will hear identical arguments being made to grant like increases right down the line until they run up into the millions and hundreds of millions of dollars. And I submit we are not justified at this particular time in granting this increase.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is the gentleman for or against the amendment?

Mr. COX. I am for it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY] wishes to speak in opposition to the amendment. I would like to enforce the rule as to debate, so that we can get through.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, the only reason why I rise here to speak on this subject is because of the long experience I have had in and around New York Harbor with water transportation. Time and again we have seen old hulks go up and carry passengers, and for other service, and the question was immediately raised, "Have they been properly inspected?" Now, when you send an old steamboat through the Sound or out to sea, but particularly out to sea, without proper inspection, you are risking the lives of a whole lot of people upon the integrity and upon the ability of that inspection. When great banks and other moneyed institutions pay high salaries for the employment of men who will uphold and support and sustain those institutions, they do it with reference to the integrity and ability of such men. And yet what is it? Simply dollars and cents; and that is all. But when you employ a steamboat inspector you employ a man who has to pass upon the safety of the lives of men, women, and children. And you can not do anything more important than to see that the men who pass on these passenger boats and ships are men of integrity and men of ability.

I do not know that they ever do anything wrong, but I do know that there is an idea prevalent among steamboat men that sometimes you can take out an old boat that you should not take out if you can get the inspectors to pass it. That is the reason, and it is a more important reason than anything gentlemen can bring up here in the matter of economy. You have to have able men, men who know how to inspect, and you have to have honest men, who can not be purchased by some people who desire to put something afloat and send it to sea that ought not to go to sea.

So, gentlemen, when you talk about a little matter of a few dollars' increase, or the difference between an able man and an incompetent man, between an honest man and a man who is not strictly honest, when the lives of people depend on that integrity and that ability, it is hardly a question of voting it down and taking the consequences of putting in men who are not entirely honest where able and honest men ought to be. No able men in any board of directors of any bank or any other institution would take that chance, and you have no business to take it while you are here representing the people. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am most heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I want to commend the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries for their work in connection with this bill. This bill, at its beginning, did not have a very good inception. On May 9, 1917, there was introduced the bill H. R. 4286. On June 13, 1917, there was introduced the bill H. R. 5010. On these two bills the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries had some rather exhaustive hearings. Now, if what I am going to say is not true, I call upon the members of that committee to rise and correct me. But I am absolving the committee of any and all culpability whatever. I am commending them for their action and for their conduct, for their careful scrutiny, in the investigation of certain things before the bill was formulated. A firm of attorneys in the city of Washington by the name of Herbert & Micou, I am informed, had a contract with the employees who are to be benefited by this measure whereby they were to get 25 per cent of the first year's increase in their salary that Congress gave them. That contract was in writing. On top of that, these employees, who were to be benefited by this bill, paid the firm of attorneys $1,000 in cash. But before the bill was reported out of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries it learned of this fact, and called Mr. Micou before it and compelled him to tear up and destroy the written contract that he had with these two or three hundred men who were to be benefited by whatever legislation the committee might report out in their favor. That would have netted to Mr. Micou the sum of $25,000 or $30,000. What became of the $1,000 in cash I do not know. I presume he kept it.

Now, there are many of you here on the floor this evening who remember when a bill came up here for passage about two or three months ago relating to what is known as the officers' longevity pay. Mr. Micou had a contract with many of the claimants to be benefited by that measure. What his per cent was I do not know, but I imagine it was large enough to pay him a round fee. The House struck out the enacting clause. The bill is back on the calendar now in a little different shape, but it is on the calendar again. I intend to watch it and intend to be here when it comes up. And I am warning you now that while it has a limitation on it, as I recall, of attorney fee not to exceed 20 per cent, I believe that this man Micou has lobbied around this Capitol long enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. Now, as gentlemen have argued here this evening, it is certainly a bad time to increase these high-priced salaried officers. Frequently I get letters, and I am sure every Member here does, saying, "I want to do my bit in this war," but nine out of every ten of them wind up by saying, "I want a job, and a job that pays from $1,500 to $2,000. That is the bit I want to do in this war."

Now, here is the Inspector General. I know him personally. He is a high-priced man and a good man. I served on this committee at one time, and Mr. Uhler was before it frequently, as he had a right to be. But, gentlemen, is not $4,000 enough in times of war, when we are straining every nerve to raise the money to meet at least a part of the current expenses of the war? Can Mr. Uhler get along on $4,000 a year? He surely can. If wives of soldiers can get along on $300 per year, he can get along on $4,000 per year. Is not that enough for him?

Now, they talk about paying salaries here, and they tell me how hard it is to get honest men to perform the service. If there is any place in the United States where we have the right to expect honesty, it is in the War Department; yet the papers in the last three or four weeks have been running column after column about a few persons in the War Department committing frauds, crimes, embezzlements. Some of them are arrested today. They ought to be arrested, every one of them who are guilty of violating the law, and I commend the War Department for it. You will never get a better personnel, gentlemen, by increasing salaries. You can go out here to the Supreme Court room and I undertake to say that every member of the Supreme Court can walk out of that court room upon a fixed salary of $50,000 a year, but they do not resign. Their work is agreeable to them. It is their lifetime profession, and they are satisfied with their salaries.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman, I have no doubt, is familiar with the character of the work that these inspectors and assistants are required to perform. Is it the gentleman's judgment that if these salaries, fixed at what they now are 20 years ago, are high enough, is it not a fact that they were very much too high then if they are not too low now?

Mr. COX. They were too high then. There is no question in my mind about that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman think an expert at $1,500 a year is a high salary?

Mr. GORDON. What do you think of a Member's salary at $7,500?

Mr. COX. It is too much in time of war.

Mr. GORDON. Do you favor cutting our salary down?

Mr. COX. I voted for it. I can show it to you in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

As I said a moment ago, I do not wish to catechize or criticize the committee in reporting this bill. I think the committee served the country well when it called Mr. Micou before it and exposed the corruption on the part of Mr. Micou. I think it will serve another purpose, that henceforward any man or woman in the employ of the United States who feels that he or she ought to have his or her salary increased is not required to go to a firm of lawyers in the city of Washington or elsewhere and pay them a bonus or a fee in order to lobby a bill through Congress.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. GORDON. Do you not think that the matter you referred to—and I agree with you fully about that—has been disposed of, that the bill has been purged of that impurity?

Mr. COX. I said so.

Mr. GORDON. Then why argue it more?

Mr. COX. I said so, and I have exonerated the committee in reporting this bill. I am not criticizing the committee at all. I am simply trying to inform this House that back behind it, if it had not been for the zeal and the integrity and the fidelity of the members of this committee, this House would have been without doubt imposed upon by an unconscionable and unscrupulous attorney here in the city of Washington.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. KEARNS. The very fact that the committee here required the attorney to tear up that contract—did that relieve his client from paying his fee?

Mr. COX. That is a question I do not know how to answer.

Mr. KEARNS. I do not think it would. They would still owe it to him.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The amendment pending before the committee now is to reduce this amount from $5,000 to $4,000. I will state to the gentleman that that salary was not fixed 20 years ago, even that salary of $4,000. What has the gentleman to say about that, in regard to that salary?

Mr. COX. I hope the amendment will carry, and I am against the bill on the final roll call.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, so far as the salary of the Inspector General of the Steamboat-Inspection Service is concerned, I do not believe a Member on this floor who has heard what has been said here to-day doubts for a moment that this is a reasonable increase.

But with reference to the matter to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] referred, when he spoke of Mr. Micou being a corrupt lobbyist, I do not believe that statement is justified by the facts. The facts are simply these: The men in the Steamboat-Inspection Service are unorganized. They are scattered in all parts of the country. The testimony before the Committee on the Merchant Marine showed that they had an informal meeting and appointed a committee to see if they could not get some recognition in the way of increased pay. They had made an effort in years past to get together and cooperate in an effort to that end. They employed Mr. Micou as their representative in Washington to see if he could not aid them to get consideration. He acted as their legislative agent. He helped them frame the original bill. It was introduced in the House by Mr. ROWE, of New York. I do not know by whom it was introduced in the Senate. Mr. Micou never approached a member of the committee in any way. I never saw him until he came to the hearings when the bill was under consideration and he never opened his mouth at the hearings. I assume Mr. Micou assisted the inspectors to prepare their case for presentation to the committee.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not at this time. Members of the Steamboat-Inspection Service came before the committee and stated their case. In the course of the hearing it came to my attention in a confidential way that the inspectors had employed counsel in Washington to represent them on a contingent fee. I learned the names of the attorneys. I called the chairman of the committee representing the men of the Steamboat-Inspection Service to Washington and told him what I had learned, and he told me very frankly without hesitation what he had done, and the name of the firm of attorneys employed, and he told me the terms of the contract.

I told him that the committee would not stand for any such contract as that; it would not be embarrassed by any such contract as that in the consideration of the bill. He sent for Mr. Micou, who came before the committee. We stated the case to him. He disclaimed any corrupt purpose, any illegitimate purpose; and the committee were unable to find any evidence whatever that at any time or in any way Mr. Micou undertook to unduly or improperly influence the action of the Congress.

But my viewpoint was, and the viewpoint of the committee was, that we could not consider the bill at all so long as any such contract as that disclosed by the evidence was in existence, and that we would not give further consideration to the bill so long as there was any obligation on the part of these men to any firm of attorneys anywhere. We explained to the committee representing the inspectors that if they had a meritorious case we would be glad to consider it and we would report their bill to the House and aid them in every proper way to have it considered and passed through Congress, and they need not be under any obligation to pay anybody a cent to assist them.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. If he did not do anything to promote this legislation, then that contingent-fee agreement was a fraud on these men, was it not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand he framed the original bill for them, notified them of the date set for the hearing, and helped them prepare their case.

Mr. GORDON. He got a thousand dollars fee, presumably for that. If he did not do anything to promote this legislation I do not see how he could claim any fee for getting it through.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I said the testimony failed to show that he did anything improper.

Mr. GORDON. I understood you to say he had not approached the committee.

Mr. KEARNS What did he do?

Mr ALEXANDER. I do not know what he did regarding what the evidence disclosed. We called him before the committee. We called the representatives of the Steamboat-Inspection Service before the committee. The contract was produced there and destroyed in the presence of the committee, and in our presence he absolved the inspectors from any further obligation to him. As far as I was able to discover, there was no inclination or effort, either on the part of Mr. Micou or the committee representing the inspectors, to conceal anything.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEARNS. In what way would the members of the committee have any right to dissolve a contract existing between these gentlemen?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We are not discussing a legal proposition; we are stating a fact. In the presence of the committee he absolved these gentlemen from any obligation to him.

Mr. KEARNS. Did he make the statement that he would not collect the contingent fee?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; and the contract was destroyed in our presence.

Mr. GORDON. Is it not a fact that such a contract as that is contrary to public policy?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think so.

Mr. GORDON. Of course, it is.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is my opinion of it.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a little statement along that line.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This related to the inspectors themselves, the men who were getting from $1,500 to $2,500 a year. Gen. Uhler, the Supervising Inspector General, had no knowledge of this contract. It was a contract between the local inspectors, the assistant inspectors, and this law firm.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, purely from a sense of justice I want to make a brief statement on the question just raised by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]. I never saw Mr.

Micou before I saw him about this contract. As the chairman of our committee [Mr. ALEXANDER] has stated, we heard that there was such a contract in existence, and we at once notified the heads of the organization who were representing these steamboat inspectors that this bill would perhaps sleep unless that contract was somehow changed or canceled. Mr. Micou came before us, and I want to state just as I remember it exactly what occurred. Mr. Micou stated that they came to him and asked him to assist in the preparation of a bill and to assist in prosecuting it through Congress, not by any improper means, as he stated and as they stated, but by preparing the bill for them and presenting testimony on behalf of that bill, selecting the witnesses and seeing that they presented their matter to the committee.

Then Mr. Micou said, "Gentlemen, I want to state to this committee that if the connection of my firm with this matter will in any way obstruct the passage of this bill, which we believe is a bill that is just to these men, we want to withdraw all claim under that contract, which we do hereby, and we release them from their obligation under it." He said, "Further, we will send for the contract," and Mr. Micou came back in the afternoon and brought the contract and said to the representatives of this Steamboat-Inspection Service, "Men, you are released," and he authorized them to notify the different local organizations, and he said, "We claim absolutely nothing." And the contract was torn up in the presence of the committee. I personally stated to Mr. Micou that he had done everything he could do, and I believe he acted in an absolutely honorable way. He had a right to accept employment and a fee for presenting their case in a clean way to Congress, if his fee was just.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. As I understand it, the contract had as one stipulation that $1,000 in cash was transferred to this law firm for work that they had done.

Mr. HARDY. I think that was paid.

Mr. WELLING. That was paid?

Mr. HARDY. That is my recollection.

Mr. WELLING. Now, did the committee feel in demanding the destruction of the contract that they ought also to make this law firm disgorge that $1,000?

Mr. HARDY. Candidly, personally I did not and the committee did not say anything about it. As a matter of fact, if a big organization wanted to get a bill prepared, I do not know that there is any law or any public policy against their paying a reasonable fee for the preparation of that bill, and I know, further, that it seemed to us that Mr. Micou, when he got through, had done all that he could do to relieve the situation of his encumbrance if he was an encumbrance. But that was not the question with us. After it was all done it was up to us to do our duty with reference to these men in the public employ. Now, I want simply to say this, that the supervisor of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, George Uhler, is a man as competent as can be found in the United States. I want to say, furthermore, that the functions he performs are more important than the functions of almost any Member of Congress. There is not one man in the United States in whose hands there rests so much of the safety of life at sea as in the hands of George Uhler. I want to say, further, that the pay has not been increased for years and years. I will not go into detail, but the simple and cold fact is that it is our duty as Members of Congress with reference to the salaries of these men who fill the most important positions that there are in the service of the land to make them what they ought to be.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The salary of this gentleman was fixed in 1910.

Mr. HARDY. Yes; that is eight years ago.

Mr. GOOD. And he then was receiving $3,500.

Mr. HARDY. And it was raised to $4,000. I want to tell the gentleman that neither he or I as well earn $7,500 a year as does this gentleman, and yet I know we are both faithful Members of Congress.

Mr. GOOD. Then why did not the gentleman bring in a bill to give this man $7,500 a year or else reduce his own salary?

Mr. HARDY. Because we had to meet criticism of just such men as the gentleman from Iowa. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say that in this Government there are a great many places not near as important that pay a higher salary than $5,000. As far as the chief clerk or deputy inspector general at $3,000 is concerned, we had him before us, and I know from investigation what his services are; and we placed his salary at $3,000. We have not raised the salaries in proportion to other raises in other branches of service. The truth is that if this service was filled by as many men as the Rural Carrier Service and the city mail carriers, these salaries would have been raised from year to year, but there are only 200 of these inspectors scattered all over the country. They had no influence, and they have not tried to have any. Now, it has been eight years since this salary of $4,000 was fixed, and many of the men in the Steamboat-Inspection Service have been working at the same salary for 15 years. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] goes the "whole hog" and says that it was too high then. He says that the salaries of the Members of Congress were too high. If that is so, he and I ought to hand back to the Government $3,500 annually since we have been here. I want to say that there is no service so important to the commerce and safety of life in this Government as the Steamboat-Inspection Service. They inspect every boiler and engine; they inspect every lifeboat; they inspect the equipment for safety of life at sea. They see that a sufficient number of men man the vessels and as to the qualifications of these men. They give a certificate as to the manning and equipment of every vessel when it goes out that it is properly manned, properly equipped; and if they are not honest as well as capable, the safety of life at sea is despaired of. The qualifications of the men who fill the places of the local inspectors are such that they can command much higher salaries in private employment than they are now receiving.

Gentlemen, this bill reported by the committee, by both Republicans and Democrats, was drafted in the desire to unite on a bill that would be so reasonable that it could pass the House without criticism. We think we have a bill that ought to pass without criticism. And it must pass if we are to retain competent men. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the Steamboat-Inspection Service is an essential, a vital, part of our great and growing merchant marine. It is not out of place, therefore, to talk to you here about our merchant marine.

On May 22, 18 members of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, on their own initiative and at their own expense, left the Capital to visit and inspect some of the largest shipbuilding plants of the United States. On the 22d we visited the Pusey & Jones yard at Wilmington, the Chester Shipbuilding and the Sun Shipbuilding Co. yards at Chester. From there we went to Philadelphia and spent the night. Next day we visited League Island and Hog Island and the Pennsylvania and New Jersey and New York shipyards, returning to Philadelphia for the night. Next day we visited Cramp & Sons' ship and engine building plant and Traylor's shipyard and the Merchant Co.'s yard and returned for the night to Philadelphia. We returned to Washington the next day, May 25, by way of Baltimore, where we visited the Baltimore Dry Dock's shipyard.

Our trip was not for pleasure but to see with our own eyes what is being done with the vast sums we have appropriated to build up our merchant marine and to equip ourselves as far as possible with first-hand knowledge affecting our shipping problems, dependent so largely on legislation which must come through our committee.

We spent our whole time inspecting and studying the works and working of the great establishments visited—not seeking grounds of praise or censure, but for facts.

Generalization rather than profuse details will best present what we found. We found everywhere, it seemed to us, managers in charge of the works who were big men, fired with zeal and ambition to do big things and do them well, and workmen laboring in hearty cooperation. We were not speech making or banqueting. The whole trip was inspiring. I realize, now, as I never did before, the giant strength of the United States. I understand as never before why our allies build so much upon the help we are bringing them and why Germany is straining every nerve to win victory over our allies before we get into the battle with all our might. No nation ever built ships as we are building them to-day, and in every other field our activities are in keeping, and those in high military command in Germany know what we are doing, though they try to hide it from their people. More than one of our party almost involuntarily exclaimed that if the German people could but see what we were seeing they would know that ultimate victory for them was impossible and would compel their rulers to seek a just peace. Four years ago all the shipyards in America employed less than 50,000 laborers. To-day the yards visited by us on the Delaware River alone, I understand, employ 61,950.

They have an aggregate capacity of one and one-fifth ships per day of an average tonnage of 4,000 tons per ship. They have 146 ways. Some of them are now working full capacity and all of them soon will be. The Delaware is a greater shipbuilding center than the River Clyde.

Hog Island, far famed in many ways, interested us greatly. We were not there, however, to investigate what had been spent or how it had been spent, so much as to find what had been done, what is being done, and what will be done there.

Hog Island was a swamp, in large part, eight months ago. There are now 23,000 workers busy there, and it is perhaps the greatest shipbuilding plant in the world. There are 50 ways and keels had been laid in 21 of them. The ships building are fabricated elsewhere. If the great steel plants who have contracted with the Government to furnish fabricated material comply with their contracts and keep this yard supplied with material, I believe Hog Island alone will launch over a million tons of ships within 12 months. The spirit of the workers is shown by their subscription to the third Liberty loan—22,400 of them bought $2,135,000 bonds. If things continue to move there as they seem to be moving now, it will be undoubtedly the greatest shipyard in the world. Its magnitude is not measured by the 50 ways and 23,000 workers there, but it must be remembered that it is really an assembling yard and draws its steel plates, its boilers, engines, shafting equipment, and so forth, from all over the United States, so that there are doubtless more men at work in other establishments than here whose work contributes to the output of ships.

The other yards we visited are different. Most of them do a great deal of fabricating work. Some of them do it all, making their own boilers, engines, shaftings, propellers, turbines, and machinery of every kind, even the tools they work with.

Among these yards on the Delaware there was one wooden-ship building plant, the Traylors' shipyard, and this was one of the complete yards. They build everything they put in a ship except the timber, and they will launch two 3,500-ton ships in a few weeks.

Perhaps the most complete yard we visited—one that made everything necessary—was the Baltimore Dry Dock & Shipbuilding Co. The spirit pervading that plant was exceptionally fine. The manager seemed to know all his men and to think that nothing was too good for them, and the men seemed to be fire and tow for Uncle Sam. They are building a great ship there—I forget its tonnage—which they expect to launch in 40 days from the laying of its keel. This yard works three shifts.

Estimating the plants visited by us as being less than one-fourth of the entire merchant-ship building capacity of the United States, we must have at this time over 400,000 men directly engaged in shipbuilding. In fact, Chairman Hurley has estimated that we have in this country over 700,000 men working in the shipyards and plants auxiliary thereto fabricating ship materials. Henceforth until the emergency is over we will build somewhere near 8,000,000 tons of ships per annum, possibly more. It is so big I can not grasp it, but I do grasp the comparison between this tonnage and that of the whole world, which was less than 4,000,000 tons per annum before the present war began.

We are largely building standardized ships of fabricated steel and iron, most of them oil burners with the most modern up-to-date equipment. When this war is over we will have the yards, the material, the skilled managers and workmen, and the capital to enable us to meet and beat the world in fair competition in building merchant ships, and we will build for ourselves and for the nations of the earth. Moreover, we are training in a great number of establishments young men in the management and operation of ships, and we are bringing back to the sea, by generous treatment and provisions for them, the highest type of American manhood, so that thousands of our sturdy, stalwart sons will take employment again in the merchant service of the United States. With our ships built here, not because of any law excluding foreign-built ships, but because we can and will build cheaper and better ships than any other nation, and with the splendid crews of American citizens which we are drawing into the service we will furnish to the world's commerce the cheapest unit of transportation and become again, as we were in the days of old, masters of the sea.

In the war after the war—the friendly war of rivalry between the nations for supremacy in commerce and in transportation—we will triumph, because we will deserve to triumph. Ours will be a victory, not of blood, simply for dominion over conquered peoples and carrying desolation in its wake, but a victory of peace carrying blessings and sunshine for the healing of the nations.

In the days of our former maritime glory, in the days of the wooden ship, New England did most of our shipbuilding and seafaring, and she did it nobly. The spirit that moved her then has awakened again after its long sleep; but the magic touch has not fallen on the eyes of New England alone. The skill, genius, the indomitable enterprise of all America is awake. New England shouts to New York and Philadelphia, and these pass the cry to Baltimore, Norfolk, and farther South, "Awake! Awake! to the lure of the sea."

The Gulf coast and the Pacific shores hear the call, and on the Great Lakes the throbbing heart of the Nation answers. While the war lasts America will do her duty on the seas, and when it is over the song of the American seamen will be heard and the flag of the land of liberty will float with the proudest and above the proudest on every ocean under the skies.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 22, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, after the word "commerce," line 9, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "commerce," insert as a new section the following:

"The Secretary of Commerce may appoint a Deputy Supervising Inspector General, who shall be the chief clerk of the bureau and in the absence of the Supervising Inspector General have power to act in his stead, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 per year."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the figures "$3,000" and inserting "$2,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH to the committee amendment: Page 2, line 14, strike out the figures "$3,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$2,500."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words on this amendment, although it is clearly demonstrated that no argument along the lines of economy or an attempt to conserve the Public Treasury will be considered persuasive to the members of the committee. But I desire to point out that the chief clerk in The Adjutant General's Department in the Army gets $2,500 a year. The chief clerk in the Inspector General's office of the War Department gets $2,000 a year. The chief clerk in the Judge Advocate General's office gets $2,500 a year.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. The chief clerk in The Adjutant General's office sits in his office in Washington and does not do any work such as does the deputy supervising inspector. The clerk in The Adjutant General's office does not require anything more than clerical ability.

Mr. WALSH. No; but does not the chief clerk of the Steamboat-Inspection Service get his per diem when he leaves Washington?

Mr. HARDY. Yes; I think he does.

Mr. WALSH. And that same chief clerk would not be found climbing in the boilers and dirty water and dusty fireboxes——

Mr. HARDY. That gentleman is an acting inspector and in the absence of the supervising inspector is the acting supervising inspector.

Mr. WALSH. That gentleman is a most competent and courteous official. I have had dealings with Mr. Hoover. He is able to conduct the office of Gen. Uhler in his absence. I am not criticizing them for their efficiency or their ability.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman realize that when his salary was fixed some 15 years ago at $2,000, it was then either very much too liberal——

Mr. WALSH. I admit it was too low and is too low now.

Mr. HARDY. Will not the gentleman admit that $3,000 is not enough for that man?

Mr. WALSH. No; I will not. We ought not to make these large increases in the midst of this great war. The only increase we ought to make is a reasonable increase in view of the changed conditions and the excess cost of living. We ought not to jump it up a thousand dollars at a clip. The salary of no official ought to be raised upon that basis. Let us take the chief clerk of the War Department, the one department that is vested with the responsibility and duty of caring for our armed forces, the soldiers that we are sending across to fight this battle. Many of the chief clerks get less than is contemplated even by my amendment. The chief clerk in the office of the Chief of Coast Artillery gets but $2,000. The chief clerk of the entire Navy Department gets only $3,000, and who will say that the chief clerk of this bureau has anything like the work or the responsibility of the chief clerk of the Navy Department? The chief clerk of the Department of State is paid but $3,000. The chief clerk in the Attorney General's office is paid but $3,500. I submit that we ought not to embark upon a policy of making permanent increases here at the rate of $1,000 per clip, which will stand as a precedent. We ought to make slight, reasonable increases in these higher paid positions during this war, and for any permanent increases these officials ought to be willing to wait until after the struggle is over, and then we can see what the condition of our Treasury is going to be. We know from what we have heard that we are going to float another bond issue in the fall. We know that during the recess the Committee on Ways and Means is going to sit to devise ways and means for raising funds by taxes levied on the people, and I say we are not justified in making a part of that tax a levy to pay increases in salaries of the officials of the Government who are already getting a reasonable stipend from the Public Treasury. Let us make moderate increases and depend upon their patriotism to be willing to wait.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word against this amendment. I have not been noted for advocating permanent increases during the period of the war. In fact, I think I have voted against them quite generally. Here is an instance, however, provided in this bill before us, for the reasons that have been stated here by the members of the committee, which I think ought to be allowed. There is no analogy between the clerks down here in these departments and the assistant steamboat inspector. All of these positions in this bill are of very great importance. The integrity of the men, the experience of the men, the character of service that they are required to perform, the importance of the service they render in protecting the lives of passengers and crew, of women and children, it seems to me makes the positions of such importance that it can hardly be overrated. With the tremendous demand for skilled labor and men with the experience that these men have had, I am afraid the Government is not going to be able to hold them in the service. They will be offered higher salaries to work in private employment. All things considered, for the general reasons the members of the committee have given, I think the increases are justified and ought to be allowed.

Now, as to the amendment pending here to reduce this salary of $3,000 of the assistant inspector, as has been pointed out, he, in the absence of the chief, acts as inspector. There is no analogy between his duties and those of a clerk; none at all. As far as this talk about complaining of the lack of increases in the War Department, they put a rider on the war-risk insurance bill, I think it was, which gave every chief of a bureau the salary and allowance of a major general during this war, $9,500 per annum, after the House and Senate had both voted it down.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has introduced a bill to repeal that, and I think it will be repealed probably before the 1st of July.

Mr. GORDON. And I will vote to repeal it.

Mr. COX. And so will I.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending, one by the committee and one offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I know the chief clerk of this bureau. I know him to be a very competent official, and yet I do not believe that we should establish here such an increase as will be warrant for increase of the chief clerks of all the departments. The chief clerk of the Department of Commerce (Mr. Johannus), who has the supervisory control of the entire departmental work, Bureau of Standards, this bureau, Bureau of Navigation, and other bureaus, only receives $3,000 and now you are seeking to give this official $3,000, and that will naturally compel the heads of the departments to increase the salaries of their chief clerks. This chief clerk has only nine clerks under him, a very small bureau, and I think we would be doing much when we increase the salary $500. I rise in protest of this abnormal increase of $1,000 more because it will be used as a precedent by chief clerks of the departments who are receiving only $3,000. You can readily urge that should the chief clerk of a bureau, competent as he is, receive $3,000, why necessarily the chief clerk of a department charged with not only the responsibilities of this bureau but the other bureaus should receive much more.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. GORDON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact this amendment which is pending here, brought in by the committee, devolves duties upon this official which are other than clerical.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman was well acquainted with the work of this office he knows the chief clerk has been performing these duties all these years. It is an old practice on the part of those who seek to get increased salaries to change the name and claim they are performing different work. This man is a most efficient official, he has been performing these very duties all these years at $2,000. I do not believe it should be so inordinately increased as to be used as a warrant to obtain the increases of salaries of chief clerks in every bureau of the Government. The chief clerk of the Comptroller of the Currency with more responsibility only receives $2,500. The chief clerk of the Pension Bureau only receives $2,500, having under his control hundreds and hundreds of employees. Let us be reasonable, let us grant the man the $500 increase and he should be well satisfied with that increase in these times.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote occurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 29, noes 32.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. WALSH and Mr. ALEXANDER) announced that there were—ayes 32, noes 34.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-two gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and on that motion I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] moves that the committee do now rise, and on that motion demands tellers.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The amendment is disposed of, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It has not been disposed of.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. ALEXANDER and Mr. MEEKER took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 2, noes 63.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, does not the count here by tellers settle the question of a quorum?

Mr. ROBBINS. There is no quorum present.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there were several gentlemen who did not pass between the tellers in plain view of the chairman. Would it be parliamentary if the Chair should take cognizance of them? There is an automatic call of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not do that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the roll be called in order to save time. We are going to pass this bill to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARAWAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill (S. 2104) to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called under the rule, whereupon 259 Members—a quorum—had answered to their names, and he submitted a list of the absentees for printing in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its sitting, with Mr. CARAWAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote recurs on the committee amendment.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The vote recurs on the amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia will indulge the Chair a moment. The Chair desires to state the situation. The vote was by tellers on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment, and the Chair announced the result of that vote as 32 to 34. The amendment to the amendment failed.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But the question of no quorum was raised in connection with that vote, and it was established in connection with that vote that there was no quorum, and therefore the vote recurs on the amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH. But the vote will be taken by tellers. Tellers had been ordered and no quorum was developed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression he first stated. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I understood the Chair to agree that the amendment should be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 14, strike out "$3,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 82.

So the amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote recurs on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 21.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4414. There shall be in each of the following collection districts, namely, the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; San Francisco, Cal.; New London, Conn.; Baltimore, Md.; Detroit, Mich.; Chicago, Ill.; Bangor, Me.; New Haven, Conn.; Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Willamette, Oreg.; Puget Sound, Wash.; Savannah, Ga.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Oswego, N. Y.; Charleston, S. C.; Duluth, Minn.; Superior, Mich.; Apalachicola, Fla.; Galveston, Tex.; Mobile, Ala.; Providence, R. I.; and in each of the following ports: New York, N. Y.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Tampa, Fla.; Portland, Me.; Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Toledo, Ohio; Norfolk, Va.; Evansville, Ind.; Dubuque, Iowa; Louisville, Ky.; Albany, N. Y.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis, Mo.; Port Huron, Mich.; New Orleans, La.; Los Angeles, Cal.; Juneau, Alaska; St. Michael, Alaska; Point Pleasant, W. Va.; and Burlington, Vt.; Honolulu, Hawaii; and San Juan, P. R.; one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if they have included any new ports or districts in this section of the law, or whether they have increased the number of inspectors? What is the difference between existing law and this bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think that is the language of the existing law, except that in the last Congress the gentleman from Florida succeeded in adding an inspection district.

Mr. WALSH. What is the reason for this section appearing in this bill if it is existing law?

Mr. ALEXANDER. You have not read all the section yet.

Mr. WALSH. You have read section 4414.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have not read all the section yet.

Mr. WALSH. I understand; but in the part of section 4414 that has been read there is no change in existing law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is true; but we are amending the section by increasing the salaries which follow.

Mr. WALSH. On the next page?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if that language, "collection districts," in line 5, page 3, is the language of the existing law? "Collection districts" is the language used to designate certain places.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it is.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. What does that mean? I can understand "inspection districts," but what is "collection districts"? If that is existing law, it probably has a well-understood meaning.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not sure I can explain it to the gentleman. We did not undertake to change the phraseology of existing law. I think it refers to those ports where duties are collected under the law.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That can not be, because the last half of the paragraph refers to ports, and under the established usage of the Treasury Department a port means a place where there is a collector of customs or a deputy.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This has been the law for many years. The committee did not undertake to change the law in that regard.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the committee proceeding section by section or by paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being read by paragraphs. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the order directing the Secretary to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4404) repealing that portion of the Indian appropriation act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stat. L., pp. 1015 and 1035), which relates to the disposal of the surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Reservation, in Montana, be, and it is hereby, rescinded.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill

(S. 4127) to authorize the W. M. Ritter Lumber Co., a corporation, to construct bridges across the branches and tributaries of the Big Sandy River and their tributaries in the counties of Buchanan and Dickenson, in the State of Virginia.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bills of the following titles, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

S. 4193. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 3798. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4542. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, had further insisted on its amendments Nos. 37, 47, 52, and 170, still in disagreement, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

STEAMBOAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

The inspector of hulls and the inspector of boilers in the districts and ports enumerated in the preceding paragraphs shall be entitled to the following salaries, to be paid under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, namely:

For the port of New York, N. Y., at the rate of $2,900 per year for each local inspector.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 4, line 6, strike out "$2,900" and insert "$2,950."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire——

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not care to waste any time on this. It is a $50 increase, to make it conform to the amount provided in the House bill; but it is a small matter. We do not care to spend any time on it. You may vote it down if you want to.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman object to my speaking five minutes under the rules of the House in opposition to the committee amendment?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no; not at all; but I say we do not regard it as of sufficient importance to resist the gentleman if he wants to oppose it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I simply rise to oppose the committee amendment, and I am a little at a loss to understand the objection of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri or his remark that he did not want to waste any time. I suppose the inference is that the 10 minutes of time that I have heretofore occupied during the afternoon has been wasted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman caused us to spend an hour and a half to-day in roll calls on points of no quorum. But then that is all on the side.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, of course, that is all behind us. I want to commend the committee for their thoroughness in preparing this bill and in recommending a $50 increase for the inspectors at the port of New York. The bill as it came from the Senate provided $2,900 and the committee tacked on $50 more. Of course that $50 will be of immense benefit to these worthy employees of the Government in meeting the high cost of living in the imperial city of New York. It will almost pay their taxicab expenses in driving once from their office to their homes in the beautiful suburbs where undoubtedly some of them live. But I should think that the committee, after giving the chief clerk a $1,000 increase, would blush at their moderation in adding only $50 to the salary of an inspector at the port of New York over and above the Senate provision, particularly where these inspectors have to crawl into these foreign boilers that are so dirty with vile water and climb up and down ladders. In view of the fact that the increase is only $50 for these men at this point, I am opposed to the amendment, and trust that they will leave it at $2,900 until the committee, in their generosity, may come in here and report an increase of $1,000 and follow out the example that has been set in the case of the higher-paid officials and give some consideration to the rigors of the duties of these local inspectors. Unless the committee desires to make this $3,000, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE], suggested, I trust that we will leave this at $2,900 and save this $50 to the Treasury, inasmuch as we have declined to save $500 or $1,000 in other cases heretofore during the consideration of this bill. So I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the committee amendment carrying this insignificant and trifling increase may not be agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts may be satisfied with the facetiousness of his remarks, and I think he is from his demeanor. We increased the salary of the local inspector $450. That was the provision in the House bill. The Senate undertook to make the increases in the Senate bill conform to the increases in the House bill, but in this instance instead of making it $2,950, as the House committee reported, they made it $2,900. In going over the Senate bill in committee we noticed the difference in the amount and amended it to make it conform to the House bill. So that the increase is not simply $50, but $450.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; San Francisco, Cal.; and Puget Sound, Wash.; and the ports of Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; and New Orleans, La., at the rate of $2,700 per year for each local inspector.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "California," line 8, page 4, insert the words "and Duluth, Minn."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the difficulties under which the committee is laboring in the effort to make a well-merited and justified increase in salaries of the employees in this bureau. But I think that no member of the committee will deny that many injustices will result if this bill is enacted as it reads. The Steamboat-Inspection Service has grown up in a patchwork fashion during many years, and during the period of time that different sections of the country have been developed. As a consequence, some localities that were insignificant at one time have come to be very important. There is no attempt to reclassify the districts and do justice to the country at large.

New York City is favored in this bill beyond its deserts. I say that without qualification. New York City is given 2 inspectors, with 30 additional assistant inspectors. There are 32 all together. Their work last year was unusually large, and during the time they inspected enough tonnage so that the amount to the credit of each one was 56,000 tons, which makes it among the lowest in inspection per inspector in the United States. If we apply that same test to the city of Duluth, we find that these same individuals had an inspection of not 56,000 tons but 150,000 tons each. Why increase the inspector's salary in New York City by $450, making it $2,950, when we do not give the same consideration to inspectors at other important places? But I will let that pass by.

Mr. ROWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In a moment. I have let that pass. It seems to be popular that "from him that hath the least shall be taken and given to him that hath the most." I realize that that is not an exact quotation.

Now, this second class is presumed to contain those places where there is a large commerce, where the duties of this office are important. I find here listed Philadelphia, Pa., one of the greatest ports in the United States; Baltimore, Md.; San Francisco, Cal.; Puget Sound; Boston; Buffalo; New Orleans; and so on. I want to say to you gentlemen, and I hope you will all hear when I say it, that the commerce of Duluth, Minn., every year is greater than the combined commerce of Philadelphia, Baltimore, San Francisco, Puget Sound, Boston, Buffalo, New Orleans, and I will add Galveston, Tex., and 10 other places. [Applause.] If I had a few minutes more time I would make the list longer and elicit more applause.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I wonder how they overlooked it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. My friend from Michigan has been here too long a time to be serious in that remark. They did not overlook it; they failed to do justice to it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Then it was unwarranted.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If anything was unwarranted, it was. Duluth is classed with Michigan, Mich. I wish some gentleman would tell me where that is; I do not know.

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Perhaps it is where Ford lives.

Mr. BARNHART. Maybe it is Michigan City, Ind., in my district.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It may be Michigan City, Ind. Can anyone tell me where Michigan, Mich., is? I pause, but I hear no answer. There probably is a place called Michigan, Mich., but it has sunk down, so far as commercial importance and water transportation are concerned, so that it is of comparative insignificance. Then I find that Duluth is also classified with St. Michaels up in Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is exceedingly gratifying to us, and we take great pride in the fact that we have advanced so far in the attention of Congress that we are now classified with St. Michaels, Alaska. There is more commerce in and out of Duluth-Superior Harbor in one night than there is in and out of St. Michaels in an entire year.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does not the gentleman know that they have more inspectors there?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How many inspectors have we at Duluth?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman wanted to inform himself on matters material, he ought to have found out.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will answer by stating that we have just two.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And that is all you need.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am not asking for more; I am asking that you do justice to those two that are there; and in the hearings there is a remark of Gen. Uhler's, in response to an inquiry, that Duluth Harbor is closed for a part of the year——

Mr. GORDON. It is frozen up for eight months of the year.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] has manifested an extreme lack of intelligence on many things, but this crowns them all. There are just two inspectors at that place, and Gen. Uhler himself says that they are busy every day in the year.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ROWE. Does the gentleman know that there are four inspectors now at the port of Duluth?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The reports that I saw showed that there were two inspectors.

Mr. ROWE. That is the board.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And two assistants; but I am speaking of inspectors. We are not dealing now with assistant inspectors. We are dealing with inspectors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, there were at Duluth 98 inspections and 98 vessels. There were 27 reinspections. In New York there were 1,386 inspections and 517 reinspections. Each inspector in Duluth inspected about 25 vessels. Each inspector in New York inspected 45 vessels.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, in the preparation of this bill the committee conferred not only with the officials of the inspection department of the United States, but with representative inspectors from different cities, with a view to grouping together certain cities for the purpose of fixing salaries in those cities, having in mind the relative importance of the ports, the amount of work to be done in each one, and the cost of living in these various cities. The committee sought to fix a fair salary for the inspectors in each of these groups of cities. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] complains that Duluth is grouped with St. Michaels in Alaska, and with Michigan, Mich., but he omits to state that Duluth is also grouped with such cities as Chicago, Ill., Albany, N. Y., Cleveland, Ohio, Los Angeles, Cal., and Norfolk, Va. The committee has not been unmindful of the merits or claims of inspectors from Duluth. The salary for all of the inspectors in this group of cities has been advanced from $2,000 to $2,500, and, according to the figures that have been put into the RECORD by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE], having in mind the amount of work to be done by the inspectors at Duluth, the committee insists that there are no inspectors in any city, that have been more fairly and generously treated in the matter of advance, than the inspectors at that port.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the districts of Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Duluth, Minn.; Providence, R. I.; Chicago, Ill.; and the ports of Albany, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Portland, Me.; Los Angeles, Cal.; Juneau, Alaska; St. Michael, Alaska; and Norfolk, Va.; Honolulu, Hawaii; and San Juan, P. R.; at the rate of $2,500 per year for each local inspector.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee. I wish to inquire whether there might not be some typographical error in describing Michigan, Mich., which was alluded to by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. I direct the attention of the chairman to the fact that in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill provision is made for assistant inspectors at Grand Haven, Mich. I do not find any reference in the bill as reported by the committee to Grand Haven, Mich. Could it have been intended to have Grand Haven instead of Michigan, Mich., included as the district in these first two lines?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That attracted our attention, and I am reading now from existing law:

New Haven, Conn.; Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; etc.

That is all there is. If it is an error, it is in the existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish again to call attention that at the present time under existing law there are four assistant inspectors at Grand Haven. That is a district by itself, which includes Michigan City, Ind.; Muskegon, Ludington, Manistee, and I suppose all the ports on the eastern shore of Lake Michigan. Now, it could not be the State of Michigan, because I direct the attention of the chairman to the following paragraph, which refers to the district of Detroit, Mich., and Port Huron, Mich., also, so I think that may refer to Grand Haven. I am only doing this to try to refresh the memory of the chairman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. My attention was called to it in the last few moments. I think the provision of the bill is the existing law, and if there is an error it is in the existing law, and if the bill goes to conference——

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to call the attention of the chairman further to the fact that under existing law in the legislative bill provision is made for four assistant inspectors at Grand Haven, two more than at Duluth and the same number as at Milwaukee, so it is quite a consequential port; but you make no provision whatsoever in your bill for assistant inspectors at Grand Haven, Mich.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This is a paragraph which refers to inspection, one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers for each place enumerated in the paragraph. It does not refer to assistant inspectors at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. But assistant inspectors, I wish to call to the attention of the chairman of the committee, may be assigned to these districts referred to in this line. It is true, as the gentleman says, that the bill refers to an inspector of hulls and an inspector of boilers at these respective ports and districts, and then, on page 5, on line 8, there is authorization for assistant inspectors in addition at these districts and ports. It is purposed to have assistant inspectors at all the places named in the paragraph we are now considering.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is true; but if it is an error and I could suggest the needed amendment I would do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I merely rose to direct the attention of the chairman, believing the genteman had that information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the districts of Pittsburgh, Pa.; New Haven, Conn.; Savannah, Ga.; Charleston, S. C.; Galveston, Tex.; New London, Conn.; Superior, Mich.; Bangor, Me.; and Apalachicola, Fla.; and the ports of Dubuque, Iowa; Toledo, Ohio; Evansville, Ind.; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; Point Pleasant, W. Va.; Burlington, Vt.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Tampa, Fla.; Louisville, Ky.; and Cincinnati, Ohio, at the rate of $2,100 per year for each local inspector.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I again rise for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman whether the bill as reported has not an error in referring to Superior, Mich. Does not that refer to Superior, Wis., across from the harbor of Duluth, Minn.? I do not know of any port of any consequence at all on the eastern shore of Lake Michigan or on the western shore of Lake Huron or the shore of the upper peninsula of Michigan that is named Superior, Mich. I am fairly well acquainted with the ports along those shores. Should it not be Superior, Wis., at the top of page 5, first line? We have a large delegation from Michigan here—I think every district is represented—and I will catechise them and ask whether they know of any place in the State or of any port known as Superior, Mich.

First, they are all acquainted with the important point of Superior, Wis., which was represented in this House by the illustrious present Senator, Mr. LENROOT.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MEEKER. Are all Michigan ports superior?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not superior to those of Wisconsin.

Mr. EAGLE. Is Milwaukee famous for water?

Mr. STAFFORD. Milwaukee excels them all, notwithstanding the Representative from the zenith city of the Lakes, from the unsalted waters of the inland sea, for White Rock and Silurian and all other good waters, and a famous beverage that is known the world over.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I might suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. PLATT. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether it was a fact that the gentleman from Wisconsin had been claiming commerce as belonging to Milwaukee that belonged to Superior, Wis.?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not understand his claims. I think many times when he is speaking of Duluth he indulges in hyperbole of phrase.

Mr. PLATT. All the docks are on the Wisconsin side, or were when I lived there.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield for a suggestion?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think that arose in this way: The language says "district," and I think it will be found on inquiry that there is a district in Michigan called the "Superior district."

Mr. STAFFORD. That must refer to Duluth.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The language of the existing law is "Superior, Mich."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think it is a superior district that is located in Michigan.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I rise to correct the very important error just made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, my colleague [Mr. STAFFORD]. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE], which was, "Is Milwaukee famous for water?" the gentleman from Wisconsin replied, "Yes; for White Rock, Silurian, and other things." Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that Milwaukee has nothing whatever to do with White Rock or Silurian. Both are produced at Waukesha, in the first district of Wisconsin, which I myself have the honor to represent. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has yielded the floor.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows that prior to his having the distinction of representing the famous White Rock, Silurian, and Bethesda Springs it was my honor to represent Waukesha County for eight years. But I recognized that more Waukesha water was consumed in Milwaukee than in the Waukesha district. That is the reason I referred to Silurian, Bethesda, and White Rock as being connected with Milwaukee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But the gentleman said that Milwaukee was famous for Silurian and White Rock, the plain implication, of course, being that Milwaukee produces both of these famous waters, whereas in truth it produces neither; and therefore I reaffirm that they are produced only in the first district of Wisconsin, which I myself have the honor to represent. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

And in addition the Secretary of Commerce may appoint, in districts or ports where the volume of work requires them, assistant inspectors, at a salary, for the port of New York, of $2,500 a year each; for the port of New Orleans, La.; the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; the ports of Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.; and the district of San Francisco, Cal., at $2,350 per year each, and for all other districts and ports at a salary of $2,100 a year each; and he may appoint a clerk to any such board at a compensation not exceeding $1,500 a year to each person so appointed. Every inspector provided for in this or the preceding sections of this title shall be paid his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business assigned him by competent authority, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to correct an error. In line 14, page 5, strike out the words "Chicago, Ill.," and insert "Providence, R. I."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 14, strike out the words "Chicago, Ill.," and insert in lieu thereof "Providence, R. I."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend line 11, page 5, by striking out the words "for the port of New York." Also to further amend, and it is all the same amendment, by striking out of lines 10 and 11 the words "for the port of New York," and then strike out, beginning with the word "for," in line 11, all down through and including the word "each" in line 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "for the port of New York." And beginning with the word "for," in line 11, strike out all down to and including the word "each" in line 16.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, we are getting our geography straightened out very beautifully this afternoon even if we are not getting very much intelligence into this bill. So one purpose of the discussion has been served. There remains just one correction that it seems necessary to make, and then we can dispense with the subject of geography. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] a moment ago observed that the docks at the head of the Lake were at Superior, Wis., and not at Duluth. At least he said they were when he was there. According to my recollection he was there in the early Silurian age, back at a time when fish were legal tender and birchbark served as wearing apparel for the natives who hibernated in that locality. [Applause.] If he had been there during the last half century, or particularly in the last 15 years, he would have a better knowledge of the exact condition. There is glory enough for all. The harbor of Duluth-Superior is one harbor, with the greatest mileage of landlocked harbor to be found anywhere in the United States. While the commerce of the Duluth end is considerably the greatest, nevertheless it is one harbor, and the glory spreads on both sides.

But, Mr. Chairman, that was not the purpose of my rising to speak on this amendment. I do not imagine that at this late hour, considering the temper of the House as it is manifested, this amendment will be adopted; but I believe the chairman of this committee will admit that it ought to be adopted, if not now, then some time. In response to a query early in the afternoon, he stated that these inspectors had all to pass the same examination; in other words, they had to be practically of the same character and possess the same qualifications, and that they are doing the same work.

Do not let any man stand up and try to make an intelligent man believe that the only ships that carry passengers float around in New York Harbor. My God! Widen your horizon and take in something beyond the Harlem River. The importance of that work in New York Harbor is great. You need the character of the men described heretofore. But life is just as sacred in San Francisco, just as sacred in New Orleans, just as sacred in Galveston, just as sacred in Duluth, just as sacred in Chicago as it is in the city of New York. You need there the same character of men; you need just as high-grade men. They are performing just as important a service. You may not need as many of them, but they all ought to be just as capable and just as efficient, just as honest, and just as true as the assistant inspectors in the imperial city of New York.

We have had it served up to us that the reason these salaries are increased is to get better men. I have no doubt that that result will in some degree be obtained. But I say that absolutely there is no science, no reason, no justice in paying men doing a certain kind of work one salary here, and men doing the same kind of work in New Orleans another salary, or men doing the same kind of work in San Francisco another salary, and in Duluth, Minn., still a different salary. There is nothing in that to justify this distinction or this classification. No matter how much language men may use and how beautiful the words they may employ, they can not justify it in reason and in sense.

This very section provides that these men are interchangeable, according as the condition of the work in various localities may make it necessary to change these men. The Secretary of Commerce can send one of these deputy inspectors from New York to Galveston, or he can send one from Galveston to New York. He may send one from Chicago to Duluth or he may send one from Duluth to Chicago. Why have a difference in salary every time an assistant inspector takes a train and moves? He is the same man, doing the same character of work. He is interchangeable in the system. I say, give them all the same salary. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MEEKER. Do we understand by that that they can shift these men either way, from New York to Duluth or back?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They can.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], and probably that will be sufficient to assure him that it may carry in the vote that the committee will take upon it. I am opposed to it because in its working out it will give some of these assistant inspectors an increase of salary of $700 and others an increase of but $350 or $500.

The committee are to be commended—at this point let me assure the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries that in the statement I am about to make I am not attempting to be facetious—the committee are to be commended for providing increases which conform to the salaries now paid, which make them resemble somewhat equitable increases. But if the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] prevails, as I understand it, the districts of Baltimore and San Francisco will receive increases of $700.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman agrees with the gentleman from Minnesota that you can ship these inspectors either way, from New York to Galveston or back? I am not attempting to be facetious.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps I had better not answer the question, because I might lay myself open to the charge of being facetious. I think if we are going to give these men any increases at all the provisions of the bill ought to be retained. I am not in favor of granting quite as large an increase as the committee has reported, but I certainly would not be in favor of amending this section so as to provide one inspector a $700 increase——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman from Minnesota wished to be consistent, he would also vote to raise that $2,100.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is included in the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. Of course, to make that comport with the gentleman's amendment, there ought to be a $1,000 increase jumped in here somewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of Commerce may appoint not exceeding four traveling inspectors when, in his judgment, they are necessary for the improvement of the service, each of whom shall be entitled to a salary of $2,000 a year and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee what these traveling inspectors receive now.

Mr. ALEXANDER. They receive $2,500.

Mr. WALSH. Is the number increased?

Mr. ROWE. There are two now, and this will make four.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This authorizes the appointment of four, but it is for the Committee on Appropriations to authorize an appropriation for it. If it is necessary, the number may be increased to four.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will yield, I take it that if this bill becomes a law it will not be necessary for the Committee on Appropriations to authorize the two additional traveling inspectors.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The language is that—

The Secretary of Commerce may appoint not exceeding four traveling inspectors when, in his judgment, they are necessary for the improvement of the service, each of whom shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 a year and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business.

So if he makes the appointments I suppose it will be the duty of the committee to provide for them.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is to be a new paragraph to follow the paragraph just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD offers the following amendment as a new paragraph, to follow line 10, page 6:

"That all officers and employees provided for in this act shall not receive the additional compensation authorized by section 6 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919."

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is agreeable to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARAWAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2104) to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. WALSH. I ask a separate vote on the amendment on page 2, relative to the appointment and salary of the Deputy Supervising Inspector General.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote on any other amendment.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment upon which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of Commerce may appoint a Deputy Supervising Inspector General, who shall be the chief clerk of the bureau and in the absence of the Supervising Inspector General have power to act in his stead, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 per year.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were 83 ayes and 19 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were 95 ayes and 13 noes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. GILLETT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GILLETT. If the House should adjourn now, would a vote on the passage of the bill be the first thing in order tomorrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. GILLETT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were 49 ayes and 66 noes.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is not a quorum present, and the Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 206, nays 31, not voting 193, as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 27, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we worship Thee. Thou art the Sovereign of the universe. Thy will is the law of all men. We come before Thee at a time when we are mobilizing our forces for the mightiest conflict in the history of the world. We bless Thee for the boys who have so willingly and joyously trooped to the colors, the boys who are far distant from us to-day, and we invoke Thy blessing upon them. They have gone with the touch of a mother's love, they have gone with the sanctifying influences of the church and the Sunday school, they have gone with the inspiration of Thy Word in their hearts. We pray Thee to give them victory upon the battle field, and bring them back not only with glorious victory perched upon their banners, but with the greater victory of an unsoiled manhood. Grant Thy grace to us this day to discharge the duties that are upon us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, June 24, 1918, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and was interrupted by Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask that order may be maintained in the galleries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Perhaps it is as well to state now as at any time that there is a rule of the Senate that there shall be no disorder in the galleries, that there shall be neither approval nor disapproval of the proceedings of the United States Senate, and that without any suggestion upon the part of any Senator it is the duty of the presiding officer to preserve order in the galleries. This notice is given in order to prevent confusion. If confusion arises, the Chair will order the galleries to be cleared.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the calling of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Baird	Guion	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hale	Myers	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Harding	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hardwick	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Henderson	Norris	Sterling
Calder	Hitchcock	Nugent	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Hollis	Overman	Swanson
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Thompson
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Tillman
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Trammell
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Underwood
Dillingham	Kendrick	Poindexter	Vardaman
Fall	Kenyon	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Fernald	King	Ransdell	Walsh
Fletcher	Kirby	Reed	Warren
France	Knox	Robinson	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Shafroth	Weeks
Gallinger	Lewis	Sheppard	Williams
Gerry	Lodge	Sherman	Wolcott
Goff	McCumber	Shields
Gore	McKellar	Simmons

Mr. BECKHAM. My colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence temporarily of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on official business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I again suggest that conversation shall be suppressed in the galleries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is impossible for the Chair to tell, on account of the confusion on the floor, whether the confusion arises on the floor or in the galleries.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will inform the Chair that it arises in the galleries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] gave notice a few days ago that he would move to-day to take up for final disposition the proposed amendment to the Constitution conferring suffrage upon women.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call for order in the Chamber. The Senator is speaking with perfect clearness, I take it, but we can not hear a word on this side.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless the Senate of the United States shall be in order, the Chair will not attempt to keep the galleries in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This matter, Mr. President, has been pretty well talked out. I think that the last word both for and against it has been said so far as argument is concerned, but I have been requested to make a brief statement as to the effect and operation of woman suffrage in the West. I desire to say just a few words in that respect.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield for a question.

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a question of order. Of course the Senator will have ample opportunity to say what he is saying when the joint resolution is taken up, as it immediately will be, but there is some little morning business to be disposed of. It seems to me that we ought to be allowed to get that out of the way before the speaking begins.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator make a point of order?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington is out of order. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. LODGE. I have some morning business which I should like to dispose of. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator. I do not want to cut off his speech, but there is morning business, and I do not see why we should not transact it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for petitions and memorials.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Equal Suffrage League of Boston, Mass., and telegrams in the nature of petitions from sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Lynn Branch of the Massachusetts Antisuffrage Association, of Lynn, Mass., remonstrating against the adoption of a Federal suffrage amendment, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Congregation of the East Baptist Church, of Lynn, Mass., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PENROSE presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to guarantee certain bank deposits, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LENROOT presented petitions of the faculty and students of the University of Wisconsin, Madison; of the faculty and students of Lawrence College, Appleton; of the faculty of Downer College, Milwaukee; of the State Teachers' Association; of sundry students of the Oshkosh Normal School; of the Wisconsin Normal School, of Superior; of academic-school teachers of Janesville; of sundry citizens of Milwaukee, Madison, Waukesha, and Viroqua; and of 38 trade-unions, all in the State of Wisconsin, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry citizens of Armstrong County, Pa., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the New Hampshire Committee on Public Safety, praying that interned enemy aliens be put to work, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from the Keene National Bank, of Keene; from the New Hampshire Bankers' Association, of Hanover; from the Amoskeag National Bank, of Manchester; and of the Amoskeag Savings Bank, of Manchester, all in the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to guarantee certain bank deposits, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ASHURST presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from J. A. R. Irvine, of Phoenix, Ariz., and a telegram in the nature of a petition from the congregation of the Methodist Church of Morenci, Ariz., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MYERS presented a memorial of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Bozeman, Mont., remonstrating against the proposed reduction of the minimum age limit of the draft, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Bozeman, Mont., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARDING presented a memorial of the Cincinnati and Hamilton County Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage, remonstrating against the adoption of a Federal suffrage amendment, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CALDER. I present resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
IN ASSEMBLY,
Albany, January 28, 1918.

[By Mr. Meyer.]

Whereas the House of Representatives has passed by the requisite two-thirds vote a resolution submitting to the legislatures of the States for their ratification an amendment to the United States Constitution abolishing the sex qualification for suffrage; and

Whereas the voters of the State of New York on the 6th day of November, 1917, by an overwhelming majority adopted a constitutional amendment conferring equal suffrage upon women; and

Whereas the resolution heretofore referred to, submitting to the legislatures of the States for their ratification the amendment to the United States Constitution removing the sex qualification for suffrage is now before the United States Senate and must there receive favorable action before the amendment is referred to the State legislatures for their ratification: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the United States Senate be, and it is hereby, respectfully requested to act immediately and favorably upon said resolution; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senators representing the State of New York in the United States Senate be, and they are hereby requested to voice the expressed will of the people of this State by voting for and doing all in their power to secure the immediate passage of the said resolution by the requisite two-thirds vote; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the United States Senate and to the Senators representing this State therein.

Passed January 28, 1918, in assembly.

In senate passed without amendment January 29, 1918.

By order of the senate:

ERNEST A. FAY, Clerk.

Filed January 30, 1918.

FRANCIS M. HUGO,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CALDER presented resolutions adopted by the Republican County Committee of Kings County, of the Mothers' Club of New York, of the Trades Assembly of Schenectady, of the Council of Women's Clubs of Syracuse, of the Women's Auxiliary Railway Mail Association of Syracuse, of the National Woman's Party of New York, of Local Branch New York Letter Carriers' Association, of Brooklyn, and of the Republican County Committee of New York County, all in the State of New York, favoring the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WEEKS presented a petition of the Equal Suffrage Club of Winchester, Mass., and a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Worcester, Mass., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. THOMPSON. I present an article appearing in the Woman Citizen, being a very brief article on the question of the woman suffrage constitutional amendment. I should like to have it printed in full in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Kansas knows that there is objection to filling the RECORD with articles and papers of any kind. I object.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask that the motion be put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the article be put in the RECORD? [Putting the question.] The noes have it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is lost.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to say that I will read the article a little later.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The further presentation of petitions and memorials is in order. If there be none, reports of committees are in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GORE, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," reported it with amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4146) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to determine and report upon the interest, title, ownership, and right of possession of the Yankton Tribe of Indians to the Red Pipestone Quarries, S. Dak., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 526) thereon.

PORT OF SAN JUAN, P. R.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the Committee on Finance, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4274) providing for the establishment of the Port of San Juan, customs district of Porto Rico, as a port of entry for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill at this time, but I shall object during the morning hour to the consideration of any other bill this morning, and if this bill leads to any debate whatever I shall object to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sure it will lead to no debate. If it does, I will withdraw the bill and let it go to the calendar. It is a unanimous report of the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the first and seventh sections of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement be, and are hereby, extended to the port of San Juan, customs district of Porto Rico.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KNOX:

A bill (S. 4759) authorizing the several district courts of the United States to appoint official stenographers and prescribing their duties and compensation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENYON. A few days ago I introduced a bill with reference to prohibiting the use of the mails to employers of child labor. I now offer a substitute for that bill, and I ask that it go to the same committee.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 4760) to deny the use of mails to persons or concerns employing child labor; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. WEEKS:

A bill (S. 4761) for the relief of William Rogers; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 4764) granting an increase of pension to John W. Combs; to the Committee on Pensions.

CHILD LABOR.

Mr. POMERENE. I introduce two bills, both relating to the subject of child labor. One is based on the taxing power; the other invokes the principle involved in the Webb-Kenyon interstate shipment bill. I ask their reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 4762) to prevent the shipment of products of child labor into States in which the employment of child labor is made unlawful; and

A bill (S. 4763) providing for the taxation of articles and commodities in the production of which child labor is employed; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SIMMONS subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has just introduced a bill with reference to taxation, and has asked its reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I think it should go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have introduced two bills relating to the subject of child labor. It is hoped that either one or the other, or perhaps both of them, will meet the constitutional objection to the recent legislation under the Supreme Court decision. One of them is based upon the taxing power; the other invokes the principles which was involved in the Webb-Kenyon bill. It is quite true that there is a taxing feature in one of the bills, but it seems to me that it relates to interstate commerce more than to the taxing power.

This subject has been very largely considered by the Committee on Interstate Commerce heretofore; they had very extensive hearings on the subject prior to the enactment of the recent child-labor law; and I think, in view of the time and attention that committee has given to the subject, this bill should be committed to its charge.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, undoubtedly that would be true if the bill dealt only with the question of regulating child labor by legislation; but, as I understand, it proposes to regulate child labor by the imposition of a tax; and I think, under all the rules and precedents, such bills are required to be referred to the Finance Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are subject to motion to be so referred.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I hope the motion of the Senator from North Carolina will not prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not subject to debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not debatable under the rule.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. POMERENE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is a vote in the affirmative a vote to send the bill to the Finance Committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is, the motion being to refer to the Finance Committee.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEWIS (when the name of Mr. JAMES was called). I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] occasioned by personal illness.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. He is absent, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. While I think he would vote "nay" on this vote, I am not prepared to say positively how he would vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WALSH. I have a pair with that Senator. In his absence I refrain from voting. If at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. He being absent and not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. He is not in the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. WILFLEY] and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Ashurst	Goff	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Baird	Gore	Martin	Smoot
Bankhead	Guion	Myers	Swanson
Brandegee	Hale	Overman	Tillman
Calder	Hardwick	Penrose	Trammell
Colt	Hitchcock	Ransdell	Underwood
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Reed	Warren
Dillingham	King	Simmons	Williams
Fletcher	Kirby	Smith, Ariz.
Gallinger	Knox	Smith, Ga.
Gerry	Lodge	Smith, Mich.

NAYS—42.

Beckham	Hollis	New	Sherman
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Shields
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Sterling
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Sutherland
Curtis	Kendrick	Page	Thompson
Fall	Kenyon	Phelan	Vardaman
Fernald	Lenroot	Pittman	Wadsworth
France	Lewis	Poindexter	Watson
Gronna	McKellar	Pomerene	Wolcott
Harding	McNary	Shafroth
Henderson	Nelson	Sheppard

NOT VOTING—13.

Frelinghuysen	McLean	Thomas	Wilfley
James	Robinson	Townsend
Kellogg	Saulsbury	Walsh
La Follette	Smith, Md.	Weeks

So the Senate refused to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the status of the bill at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. WATSON. Without a motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without a motion, and at the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 25th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 200, being Calendar No. 123.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, which was read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the entire West is intensely interested in the outcome of the vote in the Senate on the amendment to the Constitution giving women the right to vote. The Western States have long since overcome the prejudices which heretofore have discriminated against women in the suffrage. The States themselves have long since recognized women as equal partners in the State as well as in business and in the home. With us it has ceased to be an experiment, and most of the antisuffrage arguments, based upon theory and dire prophecy, have no effect in the face of realities.

In the Western States women have the right to vote and do vote and exercise the most wholesome influence in public affairs. I think it is safe to say that many of the most excellent policies now in force in the Western States would not have been adopted without woman suffrage. Hard-headed business men, immersed in material affairs, without much time or desire to give to political speculation, who bitterly opposed many of these new measures, simply because they were unaccustomed to them, are now just as strongly in favor of them. In other words, there is universal approval of measures which the good sense and sound feelings of women carried into effect.

It has been discovered, much to the surprise of ultraconservatives, that the suffrage has not in any respect changed the nature of women, although it has given them a new dignity and power. Women antisuffragists especially have argued that women would be spoiled by politics. Nothing of the kind has happened in the West. In the first place comparatively few women are in politics in any other sense than that of taking a keen and intelligent interest in public questions and voting their convictions upon them. To do this has not required any displacement of woman in her domestic or other relations. As a matter of fact, the wholesomest and best place for the formation of public opinion is the family circle. It is in truth the real foundation of our institutions. It is here that papers, magazines, and other sources of information are read and discussed in a sane and normal way under conditions which tend toward freedom of judgment and intelligent decision. Women, of course, as well as men, have various opportunities, as they always did, of meeting with their neighbors and exchanging views and so adding to their stock of information and to their ability to form a correct judgment. The further act of registering this judgment in a vote is after all, when one sees it in operation, not such a difficult, complicated affair and not at all the horrible bugaboo which has been pictured. Our polling places are decent places. They were so before women voted and they are more emphatically so since they have voted. Under the Australian ballot system the greatest care is taken to protect the independence and privacy of the voter. The exercise of the suffrage has been with us always a serious if not a solemn function. We appreciate its privileges and its importance, and this feeling is reflected in conditions at the polling places, which are orderly, quiet, and fit places for men to go with their wives, or for women to go together or alone and to retire to the booth for marking their ballots.

Suffice it to say that experience in many of the States of many years has confirmed our deep conviction not only of the justice but of the value not only to women but to the entire community of woman suffrage. We are intensely expectant and hopeful of a favorable result of the Senate vote on the national amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, during the morning hour I offered to have printed in the RECORD an article which appeared in the Woman Citizen of June 22, 1918, entitled, "Who wants the suffrage Federal amendment?" but which was objected to. I desire now to read it as a part of my remarks on this resolution:

> Women of the allied countries of Europe, organized for democracy.
> The President of the United States.
> The House of Representatives—

At the time this article was written, 62 of the United States Senators, which, I think, will soon be increased to at least two-thirds of the membership—

> The Republican national committee.
> The Democratic national committee.

The most recent expression from the Democratic national committee was by resolution offered before that organization by Speaker CLARK, of the House of Representatives, as follows:

> Resolved, That the Democratic national congressional committee hereby places itself on record as being in favor of submitting the Federal woman suffrage amendment for ratification, and hopes that the Senate will vote to submit it at the present session.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield; certainly.

Mr. KING. The last expression of the representatives of the Democratic Party nationally who had the right to speak declared in favor of leaving the question of suffrage to the States, did it not?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think not. I think the last Democratic national convention stated its absolute belief, as a party, in extending the suffrage to all women throughout the country, but it followed the platform of the Republican Party in leaving it to the States to figure out the best way they saw fit. That is true; but when both of these great parties meet again in national conventiin, if this question is then presented there will be no doubt but that both of the great political parties of this country will include as a part of their national platform an indorsement of the Federal amendment, and in this connection I will say that while suffrage has not been heretofore considered a party question, it will be well for a Senator to ask himself and his colleagues the question: "How can my party stand against votes for women, and yet expect women with votes to support my party?"

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. The question addressed to the Senator from Kansas by the Senator from Utah, for information, I am sure, can be best answered by a reference to the declaration of the Democratic platform. It has been asserted in some quarters that that plank declared against and put the party on record against the Federal amendment. I will read the platform, and I undertake to assert that it is impossible of any such construction. It reads as follows:

> We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

The Democratic convention recommended to the several States that they individually extend the right of suffrage to women. There was absolutely no declaration whatever in relation to the Federal amendment. Everyone was permitted, so far as the platform was concerned, to hold his own views and advocate his own ideas with respect to that particular matter.

Mr. President, this plank in the platform—and I had a small part in its preparation—met then, and meets now, my entire, hearty, and unqualified approval. I urge upon all appropriate occasions, and some that are inappropriate, the extension of suffrage to the women of the country by the individual action of the States; but at the same time I am just as earnest in my advocacy of the extension of suffrage to the women of the country by the action of the Federal Government.

In other words, Mr. President, there was no declaration whatever in the platform either for or against submitting to the people of the States a Federal amendment upon this subject.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, proceeding with reading the article, from which I have digressed temporarily, in addition to the favorable expression of the committees of the two great political parties of the country, who are supposed to represent their respective parties to a large extent, and the other parties and organizations I have read, the article is as follows:

> The 2,000,000 organized women of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, the 2,500,000 women of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, National Woman's Trades Union League, American Collegiate Alumnæ, American Nurses' Association, National Educational Association, National Convention of Business Women, Woman's Christian Temperance Union, various State legislatures, State political parties, organizations, churches, granges, labor organizations, business men and women, citizens, and political leaders.
> The American Federation of Labor recently passed the following resolution, also printed in this article:
>
> Whereas the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated bodies have repeatedly urged upon the lawmakers of this country the essential justice and economic need of equal suffrage for women and men; and
> Whereas the military needs of the country are taking millions of men out of industry and women are filling their places; and
> Whereas this substitution of voteless women for voting men inflicts upon the working people of the Nation an acute injustice by cutting down our voting strength and share in the control of our Government: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled, considers this injustice no longer tolerable, and demands on behalf of the working people of the United States that the United States Senate take immediate action to enfranchise the women of the Nation by passing the Federal suffrage amendment now pending in that body.
> SAMUEL GOMPERS, President.

Mr. President, from the beginning woman has played her part in the development of civilization. She has done her share toward maintaining the material welfare of mankind and more than her share in advancing the moral welfare of the people.

Yet ever since Adam and Eve dwelt together in the Garden of Eden woman has been fighting for her rights before the world. Even her helpmate, man, early deserted her in her struggles. In the midst of ignorance, superstition, and oppression she has been regarded as man's inferior. The darker the age, the more uncivilized the people, and the more autocratic the government the fewer rights and privileges she has enjoyed. As time has rolled on and the people have become more civilized and enlightened and the nations of the world more democratic the nearer she has come to be regarded as man's equal, and, indeed, in many things his superior.

In this terrible struggle for world democracy and political freedom this country is placed in a ridiculous and extremely embarrassing position, to say the least, in withholding complete democracy from the people of our own country. Withholding the vote from woman is a relic of barbarism and is an inheritance of feudalism. In the minds of all thoughtful people equal suffrage is an essential to democratic government. Let us bear witness that the women in this war have demonstrated that they are ready, able, and willing to perform their part in the awful struggle equal with that of the men, and, indeed, women have shown themselves able even to do the work of the men, when necessary, in addition to that of their own. Remember that it was the women who made the last stand on the battle field for poor old Russia, and they would be defending her soil to-day if the men had followed their patriotic example. Who knows but what the women may yet be required to make the last stand for democracy and freedom? The indomitable courage, bravery, and patriotism shown by the "Legion of Death" will forever mark one of the most dramatic and heroic pages in all history. In the language of the poet:

The bravest battle that ever was fought,
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the maps of the world you will find it not;
It was fought by the mothers of men.

While women stand ready to forge cannon, make guns, and even to use them on the field of battle, and to do man's work wherever necessary for the good of the Nation, it is a gross injustice amounting to nothing less than an outrage to deny them the right of suffrage, or any other right that man may be entitled to or permitted to enjoy. If the people of this country had never before looked upon woman suffrage with favor they should do so now in recognition of woman's sacrifice in defense of our citizenship and the natural and inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

In the language of President Wilson in his last statement on the subject, when he expressed his earnest hope that the Senate would pass this amendment:

The services of women during this supreme crisis of the world's history have been of the most signal usefulness and distinction. The war could not have been fought without them, or its sacrifices endured. It is high time that some part of our debt of gratitude to them should be acknowledged and paid, and the only acknowledgment they ask is their admission to the suffrage. Can we justly refuse it?

While we boast of being the greatest democracy in the world, is it not a little strange, and somewhat humiliating, that we fail to keep pace with our less-democratic allies? England, although before the war looking with much less favor upon this question than we did, has taken the lead, and France and Italy have both promised to follow. Is it possible that the Government of the United States, with liberty and freedom forming the chief cornerstones of its foundation, shall remain in the rear when it comes to performing the most democratic act it is possible for any Government to perform? The women of America are rightly becoming more and more impatient at the continued postponement of justice, and this is not the time to increase unrest and discontent among the people by refusing to extend political freedom to one-half of our citizenship.

Bear in mind that the women of this country are far better prepared for the ballot than the men were when they usurped the power of using it to the exclusion of the women. The granting of suffrage to the twenty millions of women voters of the country will bring to the electorate more intelligence and patriotism than was ever brought to it before at any one time. It will purify the ballot as completely as running clear water into a muddy stream.

Woman suffrage is coming as certainly as the sun is sure to rise to-morrow. The struggle is almost over. The victory is about won. A story is told of one of our soldier boys returning to camp from an afternoon off and who was stopped by a sudden call of "Halt!" from a sentry. "Halt?" exclaimed the soldier. "Don't halt me; I am a half hour late as it is." So when Senators cry "Halt!" to the Federal amendment I reply, "Great heavens, our Nation is a half century late with this reform now!"

Everybody knows that with the women voting to the north of us in Canada, in most of our Western States, in Texas and Arkansas in the South, and in the big Empire State in the East, woman suffrage for the Nation can not long be postponed. In our national affairs it is a wrong and an injustice to the good women of the South and New England that the women of the West, North, and East shall enjoy the ballot and they be deprived of it.

Furthermore, it is high time that citizenship became a national affair, as the present crisis proves beyond the shadow of a doubt. Actual successful experience with woman suffrage in a dozen States stands as a conclusive argument against every objection which has been raised against it. When once granted and its beneficent results realized, no suffrage State has ever attempted to take the franchise away from women, and no State ever will. This record in the suffrage States is irrefutable. Not one of the evils or misgivings darkly pictured by the anti-suffragists has ever been borne out in actual experience, while practically every contention of the suffragists has been sustained. Forty States of the Union already permit woman suffrage in some form. Only 8 States may be described, in the language of the suffragists, as being black—where women are not permitted to vote upon any question at any time or place. In 12 States women have been granted complete equal suffrage and in 6 more States they have been granted presidential suffrage, making 18 States in all where women can now vote for candidates for the highest office in the land, in which States there is a population of about 10,000,000 women voters. So women may now vote for 193 presidential electors, 28 Senators, and 108 Representatives. In size the suffrage territory comprises an area larger than the Republic of France or the German Empire. Of the 3,616,485 square miles of territory in continental United States, 1,827,267 have been whitened with real democracy, so that more than one-half of the area of continental United States is already under the suffrage flag.

While suffrage has never been a party question, yet it would be well for every Senator to ask himself and his colleagues the question, "How can my party stand against votes for women and yet expect women with votes to support my party?"

As a member of the platform committee I had the privilege and honor of presenting a national suffrage plank to the Democratic national convention in 1916, but it was modified to express our belief as a party in extending suffrage to all the women of the whole country, but leaving it to the States to work out to suit themselves. This was a long step in the right direction. The Republican Party had also adopted a similar plank in their national platform.

The Democratic Party certainly has nothing to fear from woman suffrage. President Wilson, at the last presidential election, carried all but 2 of the then 13 suffrage States; and recently, in the special congressional election in New York to fill four vacancies, since the adoption of woman suffrage in that State, the Democrats elected all four Congressmen. If the amendment is now carried, every Democrat will in the future feel proud of the privilege to say that it was during a Democratic administration that the women of the entire country were granted political equality and freedom.

There is a practical political side to this question: Every Senator knows that if the amendment does not pass now woman suffrage will continue to be a live issue in the congressional and senatorial elections this year. He also knows that if the next Congress does not pass the amendment the question can not possibly be evaded or avoided longer than 1920, when the Federal amendment will have to be written into the platform of all political parties, or that party which fails to do it will go down to ignominious defeat. Realizing these facts, and desiring to avoid any further discussion or contention over the subject, I believe that most Senators want to meet the issue now and be done with it. It will then be out of Congress, out of politics, and simply up to the various States, where those who contend against it from a State-rights standpoint desire it to go.

He must be a clever inventor, with a genius for a distortion of the truth and with a profound disregard of it, who would attempt at this stage of the world's progress among women longer to deny the desire and necessity for wife, mother, sister, and daughter to possess this priceless privilege of citizenship.

Yes; the battle is as good as won. The wonder of posterity will be that there ever was any cause for a battle. It was the old, old battle, in which might dictated and dominated all, regardless of right. Opposition to it involves the same principle advocated by Germany in her present world war of conquest and oppression. Are we as Americans to stand with Germany or our allies on this vital proposition? For my part, I shall stand by the allies on this as well as every other important question involved in the conduct of the war.

Every great reform, every great institution marking an epochal advance in the amelioration of mankind, is seen by succeeding generations to be the "lengthening shadow of some one great man or woman." To-day it is the shadow of Susan B. Anthony demanding the vote for women. How that shadow has enlarged itself in the last 50 years! How the great heart of that wonderful woman would have swelled with exultation and emotions of joy if she might have lived to be present to witness the recent scenes in the House of Representatives and in this Senate to-day.

Her spirit is present with us to-day pleading the great cause, so long unjustly denied, to the nobler half of the human family. Like all martyrs, prophets, and seers, she not only had the vision but the faith and indomitable courage of her convictions, and toiled with almost ceaseless energy while she lived for the cause that to her was above every other cause. Clearly she was in advance of her time. Slowly all thinking and justly disposed peoples are moving up to her advanced position. Her dream has all but become a grand reality. What in her day was to all others but a few faithful followers of a hopeless cause has now risen, swollen-stream fashion, to such height that he must be brave to the point of foolhardiness who would longer desire or seek to arrest the success of this greatest of world-reform movements.

Yes; posterity will marvel, and justly, if the Senate shall fail here and now to do its duty. Did I say duty? And let me add the word privilege, solemn and profound. Sirs, we stand in the spotlight! The eyes of the world are gazing full upon us! The world now waits on the Senate. Let us right these "immemorial wrongs, woman's otherwise immedicable woes."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, two things said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] have struck me favorably. All of it, of course, has struck me eloquently, because what he read to the Senate was all eloquently indited. One of the things that strikes me is his reference to the female sex as the nobler part of the human race. I not only agree that women are the nobler part of the human race but the purer part of it, the prettier part of it, the most poetical part of it, and the best part of it in every way in the world.

The next thing that strikes me about the Senator's speech is his elaboration of the two words "white" and "black." He went on to draw a map, a part of which he painted white and a part of which he painted black. The people who agreed with him are placed on the white part of the map and the people who disagree with him are, of course, on the black part of the map. It struck me right there that I should offer an amendment to this joint resolution which could express something "white" sure enough, not merely "on the map" but really.

In a great Republic where there is a democracy and where people pretend, at any rate, that they are in favor of fraternity and equality and liberty you want a homogeneous population that can be virtually and really brothers with one another. You can not have that with a heterogeneous population where there is no possibility of blood relationship in lawful marriage. You can only have it where there is a potentiality of blood relationship in lawful marriage.

I have, therefore, made up my mind to give the Senator from Kansas something "sure enough white" to talk about, not merely on the map, but racially and otherwise. I think the amendment which I am going to offer can be understood by any white man or, as they say out West, by any man "who is white." That does not mean white racially, but who is soulfully white, temperamentally white, who is "white sure enough, down to his gizzard," you understand.

I shall therefore offer an amendment, and I do now offer it, in line 9, page 1, of the joint resolution, after the preposition "of," and before the noun "citizen," to insert the adjective "white," so that the joint resolution shall read:

SECTION 1. The right of white citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Mr. President, my wife is just as capable of voting as I am. Her purposes are just as honest, her life is much better, her conduct is much more worthy of human regard. My daughters are just as capable of voting as my sons in every possible way, mentally and morally, and even politically. Although they have not belonged to the school of modern women who have made a study of politics still their hearts and their instincts lead them right. But I come from a section of the country where we can not afford to do what this amendment would do, and I warn the people out west of the Rocky Mountains, in California and elsewhere, that they can not afford it either. Their day of trial and tribulation has not come right now, but it will come sometime. There will be a time in international and domestic relations when if they have not already "drawn the white line" they will regret not having done it.

Why, we find during this war that even the white race is not homogeneous enough to furnish a safe population for a patriotic people. We find that a lot of people who belong to the white race are by tribal instincts of one sort or another antagonistic to the American Republic. Are you going to arm all the Chinese and Japanese and negro women who come to the United States with the suffrage?

Do not ever forget this: In order that there may be liberty there must be equality. In order that there may be equality there must be fraternity, and no fraternity is possible except under at least the potentialities of blood relationship in lawful marriage. When you stand here and want to give suffrage to women whom you do not admit into that sacred circle—and none of you do; not a man of you, not a woman of you, up there in the galleries—you are doing something which from your own standpoint, nationally and internationally and socially, is stupid.

Now, Mr. President, I move after the preposition "of," and preceding the noun "citizen," in line 9, page 1, of the joint resolution, that there be inserted the adjective "white."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. The proposed so-called Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

I rise for the purpose of asking the Secretary to read in my time two letters which I have received from the American Constitutional League, one from its president, Mr. Fairchild, and the other from the chairman of its executive committee, Mr. Everett P. Wheeler, and also to read the tabulation of the States which have voted for woman suffrage and against woman suffrage. I send the letters to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LEAGUE,
Washington, D. C., June 25, 1918.

Senator FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are informed that you are one of the thinking statesmen who have reached mature convictions regarding the fundamental principles of our form of government; that you hold, with the present United States Constitution and the latest decision of the Supreme Court, that—

"The power of the States to regulate their purely internal affairs by such laws as seem wise to the local authority is inherent and has never been surrendered to the General Government. * * * If Congress can regulate matters intrusted to local authority, the power of the States over local affairs will be eliminated and thus our system of government is practically destroyed."

You are aware that the most fundamental sovereign right of the people of your State is to decide, by popular vote, the qualifications for the exercise of the suffrage; that these qualifications have been placed in your State constitution, subject to amendment only by popular vote, to put them beyond interference, even by your own legislature.

It is now proposed, through the Susan B. Anthony suffrage force bill, not only to surrender to the General Government the most inherent power reserved to your State as a sovereign body, but to rob your people of the right they have reserved to themselves in your State constitution and to have a local question that your people will not trust even your own legislature to decide, decided by the members of 36 other State legislatures.

This Federal force bill, for instance, positively takes from the people of your State the right to say who shall vote for your State officers; absolutely disfranchises every voter in your State on this local question hitherto distinctly reserved to popular vote by your State constitution.

And while disfranchising your own people on a question of most vital local concern, this Federal force bill gives the Legislatures of Idaho, Wyoming, Nevada, and Utah, who know nothing about your local conditions and problems, exactly four times as much power to decide who shall vote in your State as your own legislature would have under this force bill.

This suffrage force bill gives some 4,000 members of 36 legislatures, regardless of local conditions, racial problems, or extra expense, the exclusive right to decide for the entire Nation a question which the people of your State do not allow even your legislature to decide for your State.

Such a revolutionary force bill can not possibly stop at the first step. As Elihu Root, who is no radical or devoted defender of "State rights," says:

"If you enable some parts of the country to coerce other parts of the country in their local affairs by the use of national power, you will destroy the whole system and ultimately break up the Union. This is precisely what this amendment undertakes to do."

This force bill is repugnant to every principle of democracy ever voiced in this country. The law of majority rule, called by Jefferson "the first principle of a Republic," is outraged when a Federal force bill undertakes to disfranchise the voters on a subject precisely because the majority of them have rejected it. Local self-government, "self-determination," is equally ignored when every State in the Union is compelled to submit its most vital local issue to the legislatures of other States rather than to its own citizens.

Furthermore, in a time of war and national crisis this amendment would not only start a stupendous political agitation for ratification in 48 States, but, upon ratification, would immediately renew the "reconstruction" and racial problems in the South, as well as double the Socialist and Bolshevist menace in the North. It would add to the expense of the Government $25,000,000 a year, wasting on a revolutionary political experiment an amount that would buy 500,000,000 rounds of ammunition for national defense, an amount sufficient to pay for every bullet our Army of a million men would use in a year.

Will you not, therefore, stand by the convictions which your own statesmanship and legal training must have given you and vote "No" on the Susan B. Anthony suffrage force bill next Thursday?

Respectfully,

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LEAGUE,
CHARLES S. FAIRCHILD, President.

AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LEAGUE,
New York, June 25, 1918.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE.

DEAR SIR: Allow me on behalf of this league to express our great satisfaction at the manly and courageous course you have taken in opposition to the resolution depriving each State of its present right to regulate political suffrage for itself. Such an amendment to the Constitution is subversible of the fundamental principle of our Union, which is to leave to each State the regulation of its own affairs. Under this system we have prospered. A contrary system in some other countries has led to discontent and failed.

This attempted compulsion of States opposed to political suffrage for women is not democratic. It is German. The Germans were as confident of the excellence of their kultur as suffragists are of their dogma. Instead of attempting to convince other States, they sought to compel. That is what the suffragists are trying to do with Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Nebraska—all of which have voted by large majorities against political suffrage for women.

We honor women for all they have done, not only in this war but in all time. We would reward them with honor, love, and protection, as American men have always done. But to enforce the responsibility of political activity upon them is not a reward but a burden. Let not the activity of jealous advocates conceal the truth that each State should decide this question for itself.

We urge, therefore, that you attend and vote against the resolution.

Yours, faithfully, EVERETT P. WHEELER,
Chairman.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, to the inquiry contained in the letter of Mr. Fairchild I answer that I will stand by my convictions and vote them. Now I ask the Secretary to read the article which I send to the desk, from the New York World, which I believe is considered to be a fairly good exponent of the principles of the Democratic Party.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"If any old-fashioned Democrats remain, they must read with uneasiness the message sent by President Wilson to a member of the Louisiana Senate urging the legislature of that State to establish woman suffrage.

"This is a State measure, with which the President has nothing to do; but it will be recalled that last January he recommended favorable action by Congress upon the proposed constitutional amendment, with which also in his official capacity he has nothing to do. Although the House of Representatives has given the amendment the necessary two-thirds majority, the supporters of the project in the Senate have not yet been sure enough of their ground to risk a vote in that body. The Louisiana telegram may have been intended in a roundabout way to influence the decision of the United States Senate or the representatives of that State in the Senate. If not, it must be accepted as a startling interference by the Chief Magistrate in a matter always held by Democrats to be within the sovereign powers of the States.

"In the process amending the Federal Constitution no account is taken of the President. His approval is not necessary at any stage of the proceedings, and he has no power of veto. Since the makers of the Constitution were extremely careful to leave national amendments wholly in the hands of Congress and the State legislatures, it must be admitted that presidential recommendations for or against State amendments are as questionable in point of taste as unwarranted in law.

"Surprise in this instance, however, results not so much from what has been done as from the fact that the innovation must be attributed to the most illustrious Democrat of our time. A prohibition amendment submitted by a Democratic Congress and certain, if adopted, to make local self-government only a memory and cripple the police powers of the States is already before the various legislatures for approval. Woman suffrage by national amendment will deprive the States of control of the ballot, denied only once, in the case of the negro, and then disastrously. With a few more movements of this kind State lines must disappear, except as they may represent provinces goaded and guided by an all-powerful centralism at Washington.

"The tremendous demands that war is making upon the hearts and minds of the people are likely to confuse judgment as to the momentous political revolutions now going on almost unnoticed, but it is not difficult to see what they mean to the people and what they mean to the Democratic Party. The changes in our form of government are to be radical and permanent. The party which for more than a century has resisted these changes, usually with success, now, under one of the greatest of its leaders, submits to them and, some will say, encourages them.

"Even though the historic Democratic Party may thus decree its own death, democracy is unconquerable. Under other names and other banners it will endure, but in the new alignment many a so-called Democrat who has lost faith in the basic principle of his party is bound to perish."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. With pleasure.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut give me his opinion as to a viewpoint expressed through the article tendered by him, I take it, from some bar association? It is this: Has the Senator from Connecticut any legal doubt but that the power in the State of Connecticut would still remain to prescribe qualifications and conditions under which suffrage could be exercised under this amendment to the same extent as they do now and as they have for the past 10 years?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no doubt about it. It would utterly deprive the State of the power to determine the qualifications of its own electors.

Mr. LEWIS. I did not quite catch the Senator's reply.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I say I have no doubt about it.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, which viewpoint does the Senator have?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have the viewpoint that, if the Constitution of the United States says the State of Connecticut can not prescribe the qualifications of its own electors, it can not do so.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I fear I did not make myself clear to the Senator. I meant to ask the Senator does he feel that this amendment, when adopted, would in any wise take from the State of Connecticut the same power to regulate by conditions and qualifications the enjoyment of the suffrage to the same extent that it has done heretofore under State law?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know whether it is an enjoyment or not; but I think it would absolutely deprive the State of the right to limit the suffrage to males. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator, of course, understands I recognize that it removes the limitation of sex; but as to conditions and qualifications in the enjoyment, such as education, such as protection of the ballot at the hands of those who should be enlightened enough to exercise it, does the Senator feel that this amendment in any wise would interfere with that indicated in the paper presented by him from some bar association?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It was not from a bar association; it was from the Constitutional League of America.

Mr. LEWIS. I understood something of the kind. I want to know if the Senator's opinion agreed with their views as to that?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My opinion is that a State at present has the right to confine the suffrage to the male sex, if it chooses to do so; but if this amendment is passed it can not do it.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I concur with the Senator, if this amendment is passed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As to any other qualifications, this amendment, of course, does not touch them at all.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has led me to conclude that he had a different opinion. I accept the viewpoint of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Mississippi was not talking about the amendment before the Senate; he was talking about the amendment that he has offered to restrict the suffrage to white people. I am not discussing that question.

Mr. LEWIS. Since the Senator from Connecticut has been courteous enough to yield, does the Senator from Connecticut, apropos of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, assume that the Congress of the United States could pass an act which would limit the suffrage to whites without having it declared invalid under the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States lately delivered in connection with a case coming from Oklahoma under a provision of the constitution of that State?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not; nor under any other decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not think an act of Congress can touch that question at all.

Mr. LEWIS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But that is not the proposal. It is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and not as a United States statute at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Senator states that he thinks the States have a right of course to limit suffrage to men. Does the Senator think that the States would have the right to limit it entirely to women if they saw fit?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Absolutely; there is no doubt about that, or to put any other qualification on the privilege of voting. It is not a right, but is simply a privilege in the discretion of the Government of the country.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no national constitutional inhibition against women voting, then, is there?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, there is no national constitutional provision about it at all, except that the States shall have the rights which they did not delegate to the National Government.

Mr. President, the letters which I have sent to the desk and the editorial from the New York World represent my views upon this question. I think the Constitution of the United States was designed to be a broad charter defining the character of our Government. It divided the powers of Government into three parts—the legislative, the judicial, and the executive—and in broad outline it indicated the kind of government we were to have as a nation; but the Constitution was framed by delegates from the several States, and they carefully reserved to the States all the rights that they had not specifically delegated to the National Government or which were not necessarily implied from the specifically delegated powers. I do not think the Constitution was designed to be a criminal code nor a set of local ordinances nor a book of statutes. I do not think it was intended that we should put into the Constitution of the United States, at the behest of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, without any submission whatever to the people of the States, provisions as to what we should eat and what we should drink and when we should go to bed and what should be our local customs in our home communities.

I think the framers of the Constitution were a very wise and learned set of men of great experience, and they intended to formulate the frame and kind of government that should exist in this country. They never intended, in my opinion, that Congress should attempt to say at what age a child shall work in Louisiana or in Mississippi, or whether or not the people of California shall raise grapes or shall make them into wine after they have raised them, or that three-quarters of the States should say that nothing produced by negro labor in the South should ever come north of Mason and Dixon's line. I do not think that they intended, when they made the Constitution of the United States, defining and limiting the powers of the National Government, to deprive the people in their respective home communities of the right of local self-government and home rule. To talk that way now may sound like an old fogy; it may be that the Congress now thinks that wherever there appears an insistent and persistent vocalization for a cause or a propaganda, Congress has no duty in the premises except to yield to it and pass the thing on to the legislatures of the States. That is not my view of our duty, Mr. President.

If I recall the language of the Constitution, it is in substance this: That whenever two-thirds of the Senate and two-thirds of the House of Representatives of the Congress think the United States Constitution should be amended, they shall pass a resolution to that effect and submit it to the legislatures of the several States—whenever two-thirds of each branch of Congress thinks it is necessary they shall submit it to the legislatures of the several States. I do not think this is necessary, and I have some doubt as to whether some gentlemen who are inclined to vote for this thing think it is necessary. I say that because I have heard Senators express in ordinary cloakroom conversation their notion that whenever there was a persistent demand for a thing they would vote to submit it to the several States.

Mr. President, the framers of the Constitution thought the people of this country would send to Congress men who had ideas of their own and did their own thinking; they did not think we were simply to be a funnel to pass on to the States whatever some newspaper or some propaganda should agitate sufficiently strenuously and sufficiently loudly. They intended the Constitution to be of such fundamental character that it could not be amended, except when the Congress thought it was necessary and the legislatures of three-quarters of the States thought it was necessary.

Now, I have a high enough opinion of the Congress of the United States to feel that the opinion of the Senate and the House of Representatives representing the 48 sovereign States of this country is of almost as much importance as that of the legislature of some State. I actually think that; and I think when the framers of the Constitution said that the Constitution should not be amended except two-thirds of the Senate and two-thirds of the House thought it was necessary, they meant exactly what they said. Under our oath of office I do not feel, and I do not think that any other Member of Congress ought to feel, that that duty should be regarded as a purely perfunctory one. I do not think that in the process of amending the Constitution, which is the process of making the Constitution, the Congress of the United States of America should simply be a conduit to shove things away from us onto the legislatures of the States.

I may be all wrong about that. I know the force and the intimidating effect of a persistent, well-financed minority in any propaganda that they start to conduct in this country. We all know it. Nobody here is fooled by it. The letters and telegrams and delegations and visitations that are inflicted upon us on subjects about which we have thought for years, from all sorts of societies and organizations, contribute very little to the sum total of human information. Most Senators and Representatives have read and thought everything that has been printed and said upon this question, and upon both sides of it; and, in my opinion, any man who is a Senator of the United States or a Member of the House of Representatives who will change his vote on a fundamental matter of this kind until he has changed his mind and his honest conviction is not worthy to be a Member of Congress.

What do the proponents of this constitutional amendment say? They all try to utilize the war as a reason why they should have the privilege of voting. They call it a right. Of course it is not a right. They know that just as well as we do. Every court in the country has decided, wherever the question has been presented, that the suffrage was not a right but was a privilege conferred by the Government. There is no more reason in morals or nature why sex should constitute a natural right to the suffrage than there is why a boy 15 years old should not vote. The Government says he can not vote until he is 21. There is no inherent right whatever about it. There is no question of morals whatever about it. The only question is the honest, sane judgment of the men in charge of the Government of the United States and of the several States as to what is best for the Government of the United States and for the States in this matter.

I am not discussing the question of suffrage. I admit freely that each State can and ought to decide that question for itself, as the President of the United States himself said, and as both political platforms say. I am perfectly willing that each State should decide it for itself, and they are the proper tribunals to decide it, for they know their own local conditions; but we are asked here to use the Constitution of the United States as an instrument, by the vote not of the people but of the legislatures of three-quarters of the States, to impose this thing upon the other quarter of the States, whether they want it or not. Now, is that democracy? Is that home rule? Is that local self-government? Why, it can not be so, Mr. President. As the Supreme Court said in the child-labor case, such a theory is utterly subversive of every notion of democracy upon which this Government was founded and upon which the Constitution was founded.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. Did the Senator favor the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was an infant when the fifteenth amendment was adopted, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator favor it now?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know. Does the Senator from Oklahoma favor it?

Mr. OWEN. I do, and I have sworn to sustain it on this floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have sworn to sustain it, of course, but whether I would have enacted it or not it is a different thing. But, Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that the fifteenth amendment, which gave the ballot to the black race in this country, was the product of force and of a war. There had been, from the foundation of this Government, the question of slavery impending, which finally rent the country and produced the great Civil War, and it was brute force that won the Civil War; and as a necessary corrollary of it the party in power at that time thought it was necessary to enfranchise the blacks in order that the fruits of the war should not be lost, and it was done. Now, whether it is a mistake or not, the Lord only knows. I do not.

Mr. OWEN. I merely call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, which were advocated by the particular party to which he belongs, and which were the fruit of the Civil War, and the adoption of which was brought about by the fact that a moral question arose concerning human slavery, and the Constitution was amended by a vote of the States. The Senator, if he recognizes that principle in the case of enfranchising the negro race, can not, I think, consistently argue against the application of the same principle in amending the Constitution with regard to the white women of this country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think I can; but I would omit the word "white."

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In reply to the Senator from Oklahoma, I wish to say that there was no necessity at all, in order to liberate the negroes of this country forever, to adopt the fifteenth amendment. The Senator from Connecticut says that the Lord only knows whether or not a mistake was made when that amendment was adopted; but I want to say to the Senator that the southern people, in addition to the Lord, know that a great mistake was made, an unpardonable mistake.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course I assume that different people may have different views upon this question. I admit the experience of the Senator from Mississippi in that line, and I know that that is one of the questions in which he is deeply interested, but I am not discussing that question. The Senator from Oklahoma, however, can not accuse me of inconsistency. If I am in favor of the fifteenth amendment, or thought it was wise, it would have no relevancy whatever to my convictions or to my vote upon this question. As I say, that was absolutely a war measure, in the opinion of those who put it in the Constitution of the United States, just as much as the raising of the Army was a war measure; and it was thought necessary—whether mistakenly or not, I do not know—by those in charge of the Government at that time to put it in the Constitution, and they did it. Now, any Senator who is going to vote for this proposed constitutional amendment because he thinks the fifteenth amendment was a glorious success, in my opinion, had better take another think about it. We certainly have had time enough to reconsider that matter, about 50 or 60 years; and if any Senator thinks we were wrong in putting the fifteenth amendment into the Constitution, all I say to him is, "Do not do it again."

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should have very little objection to the fifteenth amendment if it provided only for the emancipation of the negro; but instead of giving him his freedom, instead of abolishing slavery, it gave him the right of suffrage, or the privilege of suffrage, which was, in my judgment, an egregious mistake.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am glad to see the Senator makes a distinction between the right and the privilege.

Now, Mr. President, I am not discussing whether any State ought to prescribe as one of the qualifications of the electors who are to choose its officers, and those who shall govern it, whether it shall have woman suffrage or not. That is its business and not mine. I do not want to attempt to say what the qualifications of the electors of the State of California shall be, and I am not qualified to do it. I do not want the Senator from Mississippi to say what the qualifications of electors in Connecticut shall be, and I do not think he wants me to try to attempt to say what shall be the qualifications of electors in Mississippi, and I am not qualified to do it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut further yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. So far as Mississippi is concerned, all the damage has been done that can be done by the adoption of the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator feels that way, I suppose he will vote for the amendment and double the damage.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think any possible damage could be done by investing woman with the privilege of suffrage.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, as I say, I am not arguing the merits of woman suffrage. I am not here to say that a woman is not a great deal better than a man. I am not here to say that they will not elevate and purify politics, though I doubt it very much, because I think that women are very much like men in this respect; that they are good, bad, and indifferent. I think where you find the men bad you will find the women bad, and where you find the men good you will find the women good, and where you find the men indifferent you will find the women indifferent.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does not the Senator think that bad women are made so by some bad men?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, I think there are some bad women. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Demonstrations are not permitted under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in my opinion the granting of suffrage to women will not make a better government and will not make better laws for this country. I may be totally mistaken about that. Of course, it will double the number of voters and double the expense, and a lady has got to vote either against her husband or with him. If she votes with him the result will be the same, and if she votes against him the result will be the same, and if she does not vote at all the result will be just the same as it is now; and I can not perceive how the thing is going to purify politics very much.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator believe that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What does the Senator believe about the Philippine Islands?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I must say that I have always been in favor of giving independence to the Philippine Islands, and I fought upon the floor of the Senate for that very principle.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, all this talk about striking the manacles and the shackles off the limbs of the enslaved women of this country is perfect tommy-rot. [Laughter.] That is all there is to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If we are not to recognize that fundamental principle of government, which is the foundation stone of our Republic, what are we fighting for over in Europe?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think to make the world safe for the Democratic Party. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator will find it is making it safer for democracy, and you can not make it safer for democracy if you refuse to extend this "privilege" to women.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That argument does not convince me, Mr. President.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the term "privilege" seems now to be accepted as the proper vernacular in dealing with this right of suffrage, but I think that the Senator is not justified in calling it a privilege, because if there is a moral right it is for a human being who is of age to have a voice in the government by which his life and liberties are controlled.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, this question of moral rights is beyond me. Anybody can evolve out of his inner consciousness what he says is a moral right, and maintain it, and there is no way of disputing it or arguing about it. I do not consider it a question of morals at all as to the qualifications of electors. I consider it a practical matter, to be judged by practical men, as to what they think will be the best form of government for the people of the country. All this lingo about the women of America being enslaved is pure trumpery and foolishness. You can not get on a trolley car without having to take off your hat and give up your seat to every woman who gets aboard the car, and they are petted and flattered, and are the queen bees in this country, and there is no nation in the world where a woman's lot is so happy as it is in the United States of America.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator, if men were deprived of the right of suffrage, whether or not he would consider it of the character he has described?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think the men are going to deprive themselves of a function which they have always exercised.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But, as a matter of fact, the people regard deprivation of the right to vote as slavery.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not admit that it is a right at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator does not consider it a right?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not. I deny it absolutely.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If it were taken away from the Senator I am inclined to think he would think it was a great right.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not object, or if I did object I would be powerless. If the legislature of my State should decide that bachelors could not vote I would think that it was wrong, but I would submit to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would be rather hard on the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It would be rather hard on the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Connecticut, but, Mr. President, this question ought to be looked at right in the face, without fear or favor, without any thought of political preferment, and I will say that anybody who thinks he is going to get any political profit out of voting for this constitutional amendment will be the most disappointed gentleman that has ever been in the Senate. The minute the ladies get the privilege of voting, if they do get it, they will forget all about the gentlemen who gave it to them, and they will vote just as they please.

Mr. OWEN. I hope so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And they are just as liable to vote against those who voted to give them the vote as they are to vote for them; I will tell them that. It was an ancient Latin poet who pronounced the phrase, "Varium et mutabile femina est," and they always reserve the right to change their minds upon proper occasions; so that you need not vote for it upon any ground of that kind. But, Mr. President, my fundamental objection to this amendment is that it is inherently wrong, according to my view, to prostitute the Constitution of the United States, which is the broad charter of our liberties and the definition of our form of government, to the use of sectional, local police regulations, ordinances, and statutes.

There is another feature about this, Mr. President, which occurs to me in passing, and that is this: The object of the framers of the Constitution is perfectly plain. It was intended to be, as nearly as possible, a fundamental and permanent document. It was to lie at the foundations and the corner stones of this great free Republic, and they did not want it to be amended by every passing breath and every whim that seemed to be popular at the time. Of course you hear from whoever is engaged in the propaganda of enacting some legislation. You do not hear much from those who are opposed to it or who are indifferent or do not understand it; but the noisy minority that absorb to themselves all the virtue and credit that the whole female sex is entitled to, get the ear of Congress and of the newspapers. The framers of the Constitution, when they said that before that instrument should be amended it should be deemed necessary by two-thirds of the Senate and two-thirds of the House and three-fourths of the legislatures of the States, meant to make it difficult to amend the Constitution, and it ought to be difficult to amend the Constitution.

Now, what happens in an instance like this? Suppose men generally regard their duty here as one to pass on this amendment, to dodge their responsibility, to have no opinion as to whether it is necessary or not, and to say, "We will abdicate; we will pass this thing up to the legislatures and turn the women over to the legislatures of the several States and get rid of them here."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is a very important bill, and I desire to speak on it. I shall finish in a few minutes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is going to continue?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For about five minutes.

I say if three-quarters of the legislatures of the States do approve of this thing, if it is passed up to them by Congress, thinking it necessary, then suppose it does not work in the States? Suppose some States do not like it and the results are bad. What have they got to do? They are absolutely foreclosed for all time. What becomes of your majority rule? There may be a dozen States that think this thing is a failure and is working ruin upon them. They have got to start an agitation for a constitutional amendment to undo that constitutional amendment, and they have got to convince two-thirds of the Senate, two-thirds of the House, and three-quarters of the legislatures of all the States of the Union to put it out of the Constitution.

Mr. President, the mere suggestion of that shows, as Senator Elihu Root said in that letter I put into the RECORD, that it is perilous to use the Constitution of the United States to regulate the daily habits of the people and their domestic concerns. Is it so that the party which has for 75 years stood for the doctrine announced by its sainted leader, Thomas Jefferson, that "that government governs best which governs least" is here to-day to say that their own States and their own people have abandoned any idea of governing themselves and are now prepared to turn that function over to Washington?

I want to call attention to another thing, Mr. President. Of course, I admit this is a constitutional procedure. The proponents of this constitutional amendment are proceeding in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. I do not deny that. I simply claim that there ought to be a wise discretion as to what sort of thing should be put into the Constitution of the United States. But just think of this: There is not a constitution of a single State in the Union that can be amended without the legislature voting for the amendment and then submitting it to the electors of that State. And yet the Constitution of the United States, that is supreme and overwhelming and overpowering over all State constitutions, can be amended by two-thirds of Congress and the votes of the legislatures of three-quarters of the States without the approval of the people at all.

If there is anything in the world that touches the rights and habits of the people more intimately than the qualifications of their own electors, I should like to know what it is. The people of Kansas may be very wedded to the bone-dry prohibition theory. The people of the great State of New York, 10,000,000 people, may not be. If there are enough States like Kansas—if three-quarters of the States feel like Kansas does—the State of New York is to have bone-dry prohibition put upon it. The State of California, with all its investments and its vineyards, is to have bone-dry prohibition put upon it, not by the people, but by the Congress of the United States and three-quarters of the legislatures of the other States.

Mr. President, what sort of Government are we going to have when we get through with this "ghost dance" we are now indulging in? Ex-Senator Root foresees it and forecasts it. The New York World foresees it and forecasts it. A good many Democrats see it and forecast it, but they decline to stand up, and try to prevent it. When I say Democrats, I am not reflecting on them. A good many Republicans are doing the same thing. I simply instance Democrats because these things appear to me to be more in violation of the things that they have heretofore stood for and proclaimed should be fundamental.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all I care to say about this matter. I shall vote against the amendment if it comes to a vote, and then my State can do as it pleases through its legislature; but I have pending here an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee, that the Congress can submit constitutional amendments in the future to the legislatures of the States or to conventions to be called in the same, as the present constitutional provision is, or to the electors of the States, so that the people themselves can have something to say about what concerns their daily life and their daily habits.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I recognize the fact that the unfinished business has been laid before the Senate, but it is very well known to all of us that a week ago notice was given that on to-day we would take up for consideration this joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I should like to ask at this time the chairman of the committee having in charge the unfinished business if he would be willing that the unfinished business may be laid aside until we dispose of the joint resolution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not feel disposed to take the responsibility of laying aside a measure which appropriates money for successfully prosecuting this war. The Senator from New Mexico knows that I have always been an ardent supporter of this proposed amendment. I have supported the principle involved in it in my State since 1880. So I am speaking as one who is friendly to woman suffrage and to the constitutional amendment; but, Mr. President, this Army appropriation bill it was hoped by the War Department might have been passed on the 15th. It has dragged its weary length along until now we are on the 27th of June, and we are not near the end of it yet.

Of course, if the Senate takes the responsibility of laying the unfinished business aside they have that power, they will exercise that right; but they will do it, Mr. President, under the circumstances, over my protest, unless it can be agreed by unanimous consent here that within the hour or, if need be, within two hours a vote may be had upon this proposed amendment. If that agreement can not be reached, I shall insist upon proceeding with the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. FALL. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. FALL. May I ask the Senator in charge of the Army appropriation bill if, in view of the statement yesterday that there is no necessity for any legislation whatsoever along this line except purely a ratification of the appropriation, that ratification could not be made in five minutes? I have not heard that there was any Senator here who was not inclined to vote for the appropriation. In view of the statement made yesterday both by Senators and by administrative officials that there was nothing that they wanted done and no amendment would be adopted to this bill, with no crisis of any kind necessitating legislative action but purely the passage of the appropriation, is it not apparent that those appropriations not meeting with objection can be ratified at any moment? Therefore would it not be perfectly feasible to go ahead and lay aside for a few minutes the consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the senior Senator from New Mexico if he thinks for a single minute that this bill will go through without an attempt being made to amend it in many particulars, which will not only require two hours, but will probably require a couple of days?

Mr. FALL. Of course, I can not answer as to that. I was simply asking the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if it was not apparent to him that the appropriations may be passed in a very few minutes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator may not have the same knowledge I have, but there will be an attempt to do something more than merely vote for the appropriation.

Mr. FALL. It is apparent that the attempt will be futile.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is legislation in this bill that is very important aside from the items of appropriation. I imagine the Senator was speaking more particularly with reference to the proposed draft amendment, but there is affirmative legislation in the bill. There are a number of measures in it which passed the Senate at one time and went over to the House, but which the House has not acted on, and after consulting the members of the House committee we have put that affirmative legislation on the bill in the hope that the House may agree to the legislation.

Mr. FALL. But all the Senate committee amendments have been adopted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; there are some other amendments to be proposed—four or five.

Mr. FALL. I was speaking of the bill as it stands. Of course, I have no knowledge of what may be proposed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I hope the Senator from New Mexico will be willing, at the urgent request of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to let this bill pass and get it out of the way. I am very much in favor of the joint resolution for woman suffrage which the Senate has been considering, but I think that matter can wait with less detriment to the country than the postponement of the enactment of the legislation—the supply bills—presented by the Military Affairs Committee. The country will not, and ought not to, tolerate the postponement of these bills which carry appropriations for the conduct of the war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not been living in a "fool's paradise" so far as the matter that has been before the Senate this morning is concerned. I have on more than one occasion expressed the opinion that we ought to take a vote on the amendment, and, as I once expressed it, vote it up or vote it down. I foresaw the very condition that has developed to-day. Appropriation bills, important so far as getting supplies for the Government is concerned, always come in a little while before adjournment, and in this case but a few days before the recess. I do not believe that we will get a vote on this proposed constitutional amendment unless consent can be obtained to take a vote on a certain hour of a certain day, and I am going to appeal to the Senator from New Mexico to ask that the joint resolution may be voted on either on Saturday of the present week or on Monday of next week. I hope the Senator will do that and see if we can not get consent to have a vote. I make that suggestion for the reason that I am very sure that no vote can be secured to-day.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state to the Senator that while he was asking me a question I was interrupted and was unable to hear all he had to say. Will he please repeat it?

Mr. GALLINGER. My suggestion to the Senator was that, in my judgment, he ought to make a request that a vote should be taken on this amendment at a certain hour on Saturday of this week or on Monday of next week, and we could surely get a vote if we could get consent to take a vote at either of those times.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have been informed that there are several Senators who are compelled for one reason or another to leave the city to-morrow certainly, and others day after to-morrow. It is my hope that we may continue the consideration of this joint resolution until it is brought to a vote to-day. I really can not see that there is any reason to prolong the discussion of it, and I do not believe that it will be done. Certainly, viewing the whole situation, I feel that it is for the best interests of the business of the Senate, of the appropriation bill which is now the unfinished business, that we shall proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution and keep it under consideration until finally disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I yield to the superior judgment of the Senator from New Mexico, but when one Senator informed me a little while ago that he proposed to speak for three hours on this matter, that another Senator is going to speak for three or four hours, and that various other Senators are going to speak, it seemed to me that we could not get a vote to-day. But I will follow the Senator from New Mexico in any effort he may make to get a vote to-day or at any other time.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I certainly thank the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. UNDERWOOD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield first to the chairman of the committee in charge of the unfinished business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to say just a word, Mr. President. Senators will notice that in this bill there are a number of provisions making the appropriations immediately available. That was done in the hope that the bill might pass about the 15th of the month. Of course we shall probably not pass it until near the 1st of July. But still the moneys are due.

Mr. President, some of these appropriations are to feed and clothe and equip the boys at the front, and there is not any reason in the world why we should not take this bill up and finish it and supply the department with the sinews of war and the things that are necessary for the support of these young men. I am sure the ladies of the land are patriotic enough to see the necessity of clothing those young men over there and furnishing them with the ordnance and arms and ammunition necessary to bring this war to a successful issue.

That is my only reason, Mr. President, for insisting on this bill, unless the Senate will consent to a vote at a certain hour to-day upon the joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will yield to me to make a short statement, I think it will give light on the situation among those who do not agree with him on this measure.

Mr. President, some weeks or months ago this joint resolution came before the Senate. Those who were opposed to the resolution were prepared to vote and willing for a vote to come at that time. The great business of the Nation was not pressing. The gentlemen in charge of the measure for their own reasons, and probably from their standpoint for good reasons, concluded not to press the joint resolution at that time and to withdraw it. Having the power to do so, they withdrew it.

Now, the situation which confronts the Senate and the country is this: Next Monday is the 1st day of July. Sunday is the end of this fiscal year. The great supply bills of the Nation expire on Sunday. New appropriation bills must be passed to take care of the Government in order that it may go on with its functions on Monday. Some of them might pass over a day or two without great injury, but there are bills that will, if not seriously injure the country, seriously injure the progress of the war, if they do not become a law in the next two or three days.

The bill before the Senate carries $15,000,000,000 to supply the Army and the Navy. There is a bill lying in the Appropriations Committee now awaiting its turn to come before the Senate appropriating over $5,000,000,000 to furnish the great guns, shrapnel shells, the very munitions of war that mean life or death to our boys on the battle lines of France, as to whether they shall receive sufficient supplies in regular order.

You can not tell me for a moment that the good women of America, knowing that this joint resolution can be voted on in July, August, or September and will reach the legislatures if it is passed just as soon as if it was voted on in June, because somebody has said it should be voted on to-day, will insist that this joint resolution shall stand between the necessary legislation that must go on the statute books by the 1st of July to protect our armies in the field and the mere desire to vote on this resolution at this day because somebody has said it should be voted on.

Now, I want to say to the gentlemen who are in charge of the joint resolution I am not in favor of it; I never have been; I do not expect to vote for it; if they have the necessary vote, they ought to have the right to vote at the proper time, and I do not think that anyone who is opposed to the joint resolution will deny them the right to a vote at the proper time in the proper way. But I want to call attention——

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will not interrupt me for a moment, I want to finish this statement. I want to call attention to the fact that when this joint resolution was up before there was no pressing business as there is now. The opponents of the resolution were prepared to vote, and prepared to vote without debate, but the proponents of the resolution were not prepared. Now, the Senator in charge of the resolution asks that it be voted on at once, because some of the Senators who are in favor of it have urgent business to carry them away from here, and they want to get away in a day or two and they do not want to lose their votes. That may be a very good reason, but there are two sides to that question. I have a friend of long standing, a colleague in the Senate, who is sick, and desperately sick, in a hospital in Baltimore, and he has wired this:

I am confined here by illness and will be unable to be in the Senate, I fear, for some time. Be sure and pair me against the woman-suffrage amendment to the Constitution and all motions favorable to same. Surely some of my friends who may be situated some day as I am will pair with me. See Senator BECKHAM; he will, I am sure, aid you in getting me a pair.

(Signed) OLLIE M. JAMES.

Mr. President, this matter is of grave importance to us and to the country. It is of equal importance to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. There is no reason why the Senate should not go on record squarely and fairly on this question. If the proponents of this measure want a fair and square test, they can get it; but if the idea is that one side or the other is going to take advantage of some opportunity to vote when the Senate is not fairly represented on one side or the other, it may be a long time before the Senate reaches a vote on this question.

Now, I wish to say to the gentlemen in charge of this joint resolution this telegram has been confirmed within the hour over the telephone from Senator JAMES that this is his position and he desires to be paired. If you will instruct your pair clerks to pair the absentees according to their expressed views and wishes, we will instruct our representatives to pair your men according to your wishes, and I think you can get a vote this afternoon without debate. But if you are not prepared for that, then you can not get a vote, and I hope you will not stand in the way of a great supply bill until after the 1st of July comes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I feel that the chairman of the committee in charge of the equal-suffrage resolution which is now under discussion should know my present attitude. I have for years been heartily in favor of this joint resolution. I am now in favor of it. I would do anything reasonable to secure its passage. It is apparent, however, from the statement of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that no vote will be permitted upon the joint resolution if it is within the power of the gentlemen opposed to it to prevent it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unless pairs are arranged, as I suggested.

Mr. PITTMAN. In other words, unless the pairs are so arranged as to defeat the resolution, the resolution will not be permitted to come to a vote. That is the clear, distinct understanding now. The Senator from Alabama and those associated with him, under the rules of the Senate, have the power to prevent the joint resolution from coming to a vote for days, for weeks, possibly for months.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the Senator will yield to me just long enough to make this statement: Let it not be misunderstood what my position is and the position of those I may have the right to speak for. We have no desire to dictate what the pairs shall be. We have proof positive how our absentees stand. We will furnish that. You probably have proof positive how your absentees stand. Pair these men as they have announced themselves, and we are ready for a vote. I think the vote will be against you, but if it is not against you we will stand on the agreement.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am not aware as to how the vote has stood at particular times when efforts have been made to bring up the measure. I am perfectly satisfied now, without investigation and from the statement of the Senator from Alabama, what will be the result if the pairs he suggests are agreed to. Consequently it is unnecessary for me to go into a discussion of that. I am also satisfied, from his statement, that this matter will never come to a vote until it is forced to a vote by the physical endurance of a majority of this body who are in favor of the joint resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is not my attitude. The Senator may be correct, but I wish to assure him that that is not my attitude.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not understand what the attitude of the Senator is when he says that this joint resolution shall not come to a vote unless these pairs are made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say at the present time; that is, between now and the 1st day of July.

Mr. PITTMAN. The present time; between now and the 1st day of July. Why does the Senator fix the 1st day of July?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because the supply bills, I hope, by that time may be out of the way.

Mr. PITTMAN. And after the supply bills are out of the way, will the Senator then insist upon bringing this joint resolution to a vote?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not say that I will assist in bringing a measure to a vote that we are not in favor of. I will say, though, that I think by that time we shall be prepared, whether you pair or do not pair—and if you do not want to pair to-day, we will be prepared for it. I think you could then get a vote if you wanted it. I do not know whether you want it then.

Mr. PITTMAN. I doubt if I misstated the Senator originally, when I said that unless these pairs were agreed to there would be no vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; that is not my attitude.

Mr. PITTMAN. There will be no vote permitted until the 1st of July, when the supply bills are all out of the way; and after the supply bills are out of the way, will the Senator assist in having the matter disposed of?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not assist in pushing any measure through that I am not in favor of, but there is a vast difference between assisting and obstructing. I have no desire to obstruct when the right time comes for a vote.

Mr. PITTMAN. If I understand, the Senator will obstruct until the supply bills are out of the way?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, I intend to support the efforts of the chairman of the Military Committee to get the military appropriation bill before the Senate, and I think that will be accomplished.

Mr. PITTMAN. Would not the Senator like to get this joint resolution disposed of?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; and we will dispose of it this afternoon if you will make these pairs.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, now, possibly some of us are just as anxious as is the Senator from Alabama to dispose of the big supply bills; and would the Senator be willing, when the supply bills are out of the way, then to assist us to get a vote?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think we can reach an agreement of that kind; but I am not going to stand on the floor here and make an agreement for my side with no corresponding agreement from the Senator's side. When the supply bills are out of the way, I think we can arrange an agreement. We were prepared to agree with you about a vote several months ago, and there is no desire to obstruct on my part. I have never been an obstructionist. The Senate can vote within an hour if you will pair the Senators who have indicated in black and white how they stand, and we will pair your Senators. If you do not want a vote, then you ought to get out of the way for the good of the Government until the Army supply bills shall have been passed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Would the Senator be willing to agree to vote on the 1st day of July in the event the pairs are made?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When we get to the 1st of July we will make the agreement; but it is not necessary to make it until then. I do not think you would be willing to agree to the 1st of July as the time until you had consulted your own friends and your own side as to whether or not it met their convenience at that time.

Mr. PITTMAN. In other words, Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama and those who are with him are determined never to enter into any agreement as to a vote on this joint resolution, except it be assured to them by conditions then existing that they will defeat the resolution. Then it comes back to the exact proposition which I have laid down as my understanding, that there is not going to be a vote on this joint resolution until that side having the majority of votes and the determination and the physical endurance can through such force win out. Now, then, I am unwilling, no matter how ardently I support this measure, to set aside indefinitely this great appropriation bill, which is now pending as the unfinished business, or any of the other great appropriation bills for this measure. I should be willing to set it aside for two hours, or three hours, or five hours, or six hours, or for possibly a day; but I know that the time taken would be futile, so far as the passage of the joint resolution is concerned. I know that a week so used would be futile, so far as this joint resolution is concerned, and possibly a month; and I would not be willing to set aside this great appropriation bill that is so necessary for the carrying on of this war, or any other appropriation bill for any unreasonable length of time. Therefore I must vote, if the matter comes to a vote, against displacing the unfinished business. I would even oppose any unanimous-consent agreement to take up any undue length of time at the expense of this war measure or any other war measure.

The reason I was asking the Senator from Alabama the question was, if it is the intention, as I understand, of this body to recess for four or five weeks upon the completion of the great supply bills, to ascertain if at that time he would, with us, oppose a recess until the suffrage resolution is considered. I ask the Senator if he will join with us, after these great supply bills are disposed of, in attempting to dispose of this joint resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have stated to the Senator from Nevada, and I think I ought to have made myself clear, that I am opposed to the joint resolution, and I am not going to do anything that will aid the Senator in its passage; but it is a different proposition about obstruction. When we fairly adjust this matter as to the pairs in the Senate, there will be no obstruction on my part or on the part of those, I think, who cooperate with me; but to say that we will help to take up a measure which we do not want passed is a different attitude, and one which we do not occupy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the fact that when the recess ends and Senators return to their duties here the great revenue bill will then be before the Senate, and no Senator is rash enough, I apprehend, to believe that the revenue bill will be disposed of short of several weeks' debate. It was for that reason that I suggested that if we could come to an agreement to vote on this measure on Monday next, which will be just precedent to the proposed recess, that would be a fair solution of the question.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I thoroughly agree with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. It is apparent that after the recess we shall be in exactly the same condition with regard to vital legislation that we are now. There is but one chance during this session of Congress, in my opinion, to pass this joint resolution, and that is during the period of time when it is proposed to recess. The proponents of this resolution have a majority vote in the Senate; in fact, at this very moment they have a two-thirds vote in the Senate, I understand; and I believe it is the duty of the proponents of this resolution to vote against any recess until this resolution shall have been disposed of. I believe it is the duty of the majority, the proponents of this resolution, when the time comes that we may have a month's recess, to vote that there shall be no recess of this body until this joint resolution is voted on. I certainly will make such a fight. We shall have 30 days and 30 nights to test endurance with the Senator from Alabama and his cohorts.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will excuse me from yielding just now, because I want to make a short statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wanted to answer a suggestion which has been made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not risen for the purpose of making a speech.

The Senator from Nevada, Mr. President, and the Senator from New Hampshire have stated that when we meet after the recess there will be no time in which to act upon this joint resolution. On the contrary, there will be the most ample time for action, without interfering in the slightest with the revenue bill. When we meet on the 10th of August, should we adjourn to that date—and I assume that we shall—the Senate will have no business before it until the other House has passed the revenue bill. According to the most conservative estimate it will take the House of Representatives at least 10 days to pass that bill. Then it will come to the Senate, and it will not be before the Senate for action until it has been referred to the Finance Committee and until that committee has finally reported it back to the Senate. I assume, Mr. President, that if the Finance Committee is able to report that bill back to the Senate in three weeks, or even within a month after it is referred to them, it will be doing very good work. So the Senate will be here in a condition to act upon this joint resolution without any interference with the war-revenue bill for the 10 days that the other House will certainly be considering it and for the three weeks which the Senate Committee on Finance will certainly be considering it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, what does the Senator think of this suggestion, then: Suppose, after we get through with the supply bills, we defer our recess for 10 days until we, say, on the 20th of July, finish this joint resolution, and then take our recess for 10 days longer, until the 20th day of August? What does the Senator think of that suggestion?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not attempting to answer the Senator's suggestion with reference to immediate action; I was simply addressing myself to the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that after the recess we should not have an opportunity to act upon this joint resolution without interfering with the revenue bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then why not extend the recess later, complete our present business now, and then convene at a later date?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to make a brief statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has told what the advocates of the resolution can do and what they can not do by way of a vote to-day. I want to say to the junior Senator from Alabama that the friends of this joint resolution can prevent, and, in my opinion, will not permit, a recess of this Congress until the resolution is passed. A majority of the Senate can prevent a recess, and there will be nothing, after the supply bills are out of the way, which will prevent us acting upon the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely want to make a statement.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like an opportunity to make a statement myself.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely want to assure the Senator from Utah that we can stay here as long as he can; and that is no threat. We will be here to vote when the time comes, and we are simply asking you to allow us what has ordinarily been done as to the making of pairs; and we will vote now.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not speaking about "now," but what the proponents of this joint resolution can do and I believe will do. We are going to have a vote on this joint resolution before there is a recess.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I decline to yield any further. I have considered very carefully the suggestion——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Why does not the Senator move to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the Senator from New Mexico that if he proceeds to yield under the conditions which have developed here he will lose the floor. He has already exhausted his right to yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well; then I decline to yield further. I wish to say that the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama did not come as a new suggestion to me. I have been made acquainted with the situation which he presented. The absent and the ill Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] has no dearer friend in this body than he has in me, and I know of no Senator whom I would more gladly favor or to whom I would grant a real favor than the Senator from Kentucky, but upon this question I would be unwilling to pair with anybody under any circumstances, and if I am unwilling to pair with anybody under any circumstances on this question, then I am unwilling to ask any of my colleagues in the Senate to do a thing which I would not myself do. That is the situation which confronts the Senate.

We do not know when the absent Senator will be here. I hope he may be here at an early date, restored to his usual vigorous health, but as to that I have no assurance, nor is there any assurance that unless he returns he can ever obtain a pair from anybody, and there is nothing of hope held out to us that delay will aid in settling the question of a pair. We have just as good hope of a pair now as we will have later. If a Senator to-day is unwilling to pair, he will be unwilling to-morrow; he will be unwilling next week; and so far as that question is concerned we might just as well take the vote now.

Now, Mr. President, as to the question of delay. We are told by the chairman of the committee having in charge the unfinished business that it is important that that business should pass. I accept that statement at its full value. It is important; it ought to pass; and I am willing to help pass it at any time that we are able to bring it to vote, but yesterday afternoon the Senate adjourned at 4 o'clock. Why did we not proceed with the bill then?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I answer that suggestion?

Mr. SHAFROTH rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will suggest to the Senator that the Senate adjourned over last Friday and Saturday, not having anything to do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has assented to my interrupting him, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I certainly yield to the Senator for a question or to answer what I have said.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The adjournment was taken yesterday afternoon because it was claimed, as I was informed, that two conference reports were to be presented, and that it would take the remainder of the time of the Senate to dispose of them. As a matter of fact, it did not take any time whatever, for there was no discussion of them, and the adjournment was in order that the woman-suffrage amendment might be discussed during the morning hour.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am very glad to hear the statement made by the Senator. Now, upon the question of delay, the Senator from Alabama and others who have made statements indicating a disposition to prolong the discussion upon this joint resolution must realize the importance of the unfinished business just as much as the remainder of us, and I do not think that it is proper for me to suggest that the Senator from Alabama and other Senators, knowing the importance of the unfinished business, will prolong the discussion upon this joint resolution to an unseemly length. I can not believe it. I believe that they are just as patriotic as the rest of us, and that they will consent to a vote upon this joint resolution when a reasonable time for discussion has been given; but, Mr. President, if the debate should be so prolonged that the majority of the Senate should feel that those opposed to this joint resolution were willing to consume the time of the Senate to such an extent as to defeat the unfinished business or to defer it for an unusual period, we can then consider the question of laying aside the joint resolution. I do not believe, however, that time has come; and it seems to me that the thing for us to do is to consider the joint resolution now. Notice a week ago was given. Senators have come here from the four corners of the country for the express purpose of voting upon this proposed constitutional amendment, and they expect the vote to come now.

I remember being taunted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] when, a few weeks ago, we decided not to bring to a vote this joint resolution. The Senator wanted to know if when we again gave notice we would bring it to a vote in fact. I wish to say, Mr. President, there is nothing more important before the Senate to-day than this joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 200.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Mexico that the Senate proceed to the considerartion of House joint resolution 200.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is the question debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the Senator that it is.

Mr. REED addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I merely rise to submit a parliamentary inquiry. What is the order of parliamentary procedure at this time? Is it upon the motion of the Senator from New Mexico that we proceed to consider the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution extending the right of suffrage to women?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the only question before the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, inasmuch as that is the only proposition that is before the Senate, I wish to say a few words with relation to it.

In the first place, as to the reflection which has been made upon about two-thirds of the Members of this body on account of their failure to agree to a pair, it seems to me that the matter of pairs is something that is dependent entirely upon the importance of the matter under consideration. I have not any doubt that there is not a Senator who has been objecting here who, if the question was whether we should take up a force bill, would pair with any other Senator, no matter who he might be or how much he is beloved. It is not a question of friendship or a lack of friendship. It is a matter purely as to how important Senators regard the matter that is presented to the Senate; and on that account a Senator should not be criticized for being firm in his convictions as to the necessity of the passage of the measure by refusing to pair with anyone.

Why, Mr. President, pairing is an individual affair; it is not a party arrangement. No Senator in charge of a bill can control pairs. If any Senator wants to pair with any other Senator upon any measure, he can do so without being subject to criticism. Because I think that this is a most important measure, because I think it towers over any other measure before the Senate, why should I be censured by anybody for failing to make a pair with some other Senator? Senator JAMES is loved and admired by all the Senators in this body, but no one deeply interested in any measure should be criticized if he insists on voting for the measure he thinks so important.

Mr. President, we had before this body about two months ago the question of setting a time for a vote upon this same joint resolution, and unanimous consent was asked to fix a time for the consideration of the measure; but there was strong objection made then. Notice was then given by the chairman of the committee that he would move for consideration at a certain day in May. However, when the other side seemed to find that we were not ready in the matter, then they turned the tables and tried to insist upon our taking the measure up for consideration immediately. Some Senators complained that they had traveled long distances to reach the Capital and it had greatly inconvenienced them to have the vote delayed. It was then insisted that we give a notice of some length, so that both sides could get their supporters here.

One week's notice was given in the Senate by the chairman of the committee that he would move consideration of the joint resolution to-day. Nearly all of our side are here and will be greatly inconvenienced if they have to return. Senator JAMES's illness, while not dangerous, is likely to confine him to his bed for a considerable time. The same condition will no doubt arise when the measure is called up again.

Mr. President, what is the situation with respect to the military bill? Every Senator is in favor of the military bill. It can be passed in 20 minutes, in my judgment, if necessary. It has been said that in 15 minutes a vote could be had upon the pending joint resolution if certain things were done.

Mr. President, I regard the joint resolution as unquestionably the most important measure before the Senate. If there is any truth in the Declaration of Independence that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed, when we know that one-half of the people are deprived of their rights now, how can it be said that it is unimportant or that it is not a question that involves the very fundamental principle of our form of government? Are Senators who have strong convictions upon that question to be held up as not possessing a regard for the courtesies that should maintain in the good fellowship of the Senate of the United States?

Mr. President, we know that the Military Committee has reported a bill here. It has known that it would report that bill for a good many months; it has known for a year when that bill should be reported in order to be passed by the beginning of the next fiscal year. We know that, while it is important that the military bill should be passed, yet it is not imperative that it should be passed upon this identical day. We have seen many appropriation bill run over for a good deal longer time than two, three, four, or even five days beyond the fiscal year. If Senators are ready to vote upon this resolution within 15 minutes upon certain conditions proposed, it seems to me that when they do not it shows an intention to thwart a vote at all upon the joint resolution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I believe in the rule of the majority, and I ask the Senator to give those who favor displacing the military bill an opportunity to vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. And, Mr. President, if the Senate wants to take the responsibility of displacing the great supply bill, so far as I am concerned, as chairman of the committee, I am willing that they shall assume that responsibility.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am perfectly willing to do so, Mr. President. I am not making a two-hour-and-a-half speech; I have spoken only about five minutes, and I am content with what I have said.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McKellar	Smith, Mich.
Baird	Guion	McNary	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Hale	Martin	Smoot
Beckham	Harding	Nelson	Sterling
Borah	Hardwick	New	Sutherland
Brandegee	Henderson	Norris	Swanson
Calder	Hitchcock	Nugent	Thompson
Chamberlain	Hollis	Overman	Tillman
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Trammell
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Underwood
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Vardaman
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Kellogg	Poindexter	Walsh
Fall	Kendrick	Pomerene	Warren
Fernald	Kenyon	Ransdell	Watson
Fletcher	King	Reed	Weeks
France	Kirby	Robinson	Wilfley
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Shafroth	Williams
Gallinger	Lenroot	Sheppard	Wolcott
Gerry	Lewis	Simmons
Goff	Lodge	Smith, Ga.
Gore	McCumber	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I regret very much that the sentiment on the part of some of the Members of the Senate seems to indicate very strongly, and in a rather positive manner, that to press the motion which is now pending will unduly delay the consideration of the supply bills which are pending in the Senate. I regret that exceedingly. I think the sentiment of the country is that this joint resolution should come to a vote and that it should be passed.

I will state that I have just received a telegram from the Commonwealth of Connecticut which contains a copy of a resolution submitted by the committee on resolutions of the Democratic convention being held in that State:

> That the committee on resolutions of the Democratic Party in convention assembled do urgently call upon the Senate of the United States to pass the Federal woman suffrage amendment and send it to the several States for ratification.

We have, of course, heard from one representative of that great State to-day in opposition to the amendment; but I consider that it is at least encouraging to know that such a resolution as this is now pending in the State of Connecticut.

I want this joint resolution to pass. I believe it will pass; but it is evident from statements made here that if it is pressed now there will be great delay in its passage and in the passage of the supply bills. Therefore I am going to ask to withdraw the motion I have made, and which is now pending, to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, with the understanding that after the supply bills are out of the way this matter will be again brought before the Senate and will be kept before the Senate in the face of any attempt to recess for the summer.

I make that request, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to withdraw his motion, and it is withdrawn.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I believe the pending amendment to the Army appropriation bill is the one in reference to the draft age. I ask that it may be called up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. As modified by that Senator, the amendment reads as follows:

> Provided, That the age limit fixed in said act is hereby changed, and shall be and is hereby fixed at 20 and 40 years in lieu of 21 and 31.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I suppose that as the War Department has expressed itself against any increase at the present time, the proposed amendment will fail; but I want to say a few words with regard to the draft age and the necessity of extending it.

The necessity of extending it does not rest upon the fact that the entire number of men between 21 and 31 is exhausted, because that, of course, is not the case, but upon the fact that we are approaching the exhaustion of the first class and that we do not desire to enter upon those classes that have dependents or that are retained for special industries, and it is therefore desirable to go among older men for the purpose of getting more unmarried men corresponding to class 1 of the present draft. It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we are not to go beyond class 1 in the present draft it is absolutely necessary to make some extension.

Now, Mr. President, I shall be very brief, but I want to say a word in regard to draft ages.

It is common to speak about 18 to 45 as if those ages rested upon some solid basis of reason. They do not. They are entirely haphazard. We use them for the Regular Army, the regular Navy, the regular Marine Corps, and the National Guard. I suppose they rested originally on the somewhat loose theory that a boy of 18 was sufficiently developed physically to go into military service, and that when you reached 45 you reached a point where there was a physical decline sufficient to make the man undesirable for the hardships of a soldier's life. But, Mr. President, both assumptions are unfounded. A boy of 18 is still in the growing stage. He is better material two years or three years later. The physical condition of men, if I am not mistaken, begins to turn the corner at 30 or 32. We are taking, under our draft, men of the very best age for military service. We have left the old limits of 18 to 45, as I have said, for the Regular Army, the regular Navy, the regular Marine Corps, and the National Guard, but those are all voluntary; and when you come to apply conscription, compulsory service, I think you ought to proceed as far as possible upon some scientific basis.

In the first place, you are calling the man to a duty which, as an American citizen of voting age and a taxpayer, is an additional duty which he ought to perform. Physically, you are taking him at a better age than 18; and I think we decided very wisely in fixing those limits. I have no objection if it is desired to make it 20; but I think to go below that would be a great mistake, and I shall be content to see it remain at 21. Now, when you come to the other end, the attainment of the age of 45 is not an indication of physical unfitness any more than the age of 35. The decline begins at an earlier time. It is slow in some men; it is more rapid in others—I mean, physiologically speaking, a decline from the highest physical condition. If you go 10 years, another decade, you bring in a large number, probably, of unmarried men; not as many as in the first decade you take; but a large number.

I think, if anyone will stop to consider it, that 40 is not a haphazard number. You can only approximate with any age you take, but 40 approximates very nearly to a division which seems to be an extremely important one to make. Below 40 the chances are all against a man's having a son in the Army. It would require an unusually early marriage to furnish a son of 21, or even of 18, when the father is below the age of 40. Of course, such cases occur, but they are very few. After you pass the age of 40 you begin to get among the class of men, and many of them, who have sons in the Army at this moment. If the son goes to the Army, very likely he leaves a young wife and child, and the father is the support of the entire family. In other words, you begin to invade a class which it is extremely desirable not to invade unless it becomes absolutely necessary to do so.

Of course we can imagine the war reaching such a point that, in the conventional phrase, we rob the cradle and the grave. If it is necessary, we will take them of all ages and any age, but we have not reached that point yet; and in fixing these ages it is important, in my opinion, to try to fix them in some way so as to conserve as far as possible the strength of the country. If you go below 21, still more if you go below 20 and take boys of 18, and fill your Army from them, there will be very few exemptions—practically none on account of dependents, or indispensability in any trade; but you take the boy before he is physically at his best, and you cut him off from all education. If we extend the draft down to 18 at this time, I do not hesitate to say it will close practically every college in the country. They are deprived now of more than half, and the half that remains is made up of the younger classes of boys under the draft age.

Harvard College had its commencement the other day. The senior class had entered 700. It graduated 173. They had all gone except the 173. But in the younger years the colleges take the men under the draft age; and we do not want, if we can help it—we may have to come to it, but we do not want deliberately by law, by compulsory service—to take those very young men, mere boys, and create a general illiteracy among the men in whose hands the future of the country rests.

It seems to me there are a great many very strong arguments against lowering the age, and in the same way I think it is unwise to go beyond 40, for the reasons which I have given.

I only desired to say these few words in regard to the matter, because it has seemed to me that we have talked very crudely about the limit, as if it were merely haphazard. There are good reasons, if we will take the trouble to study the question, for fixing certain limitations. Our effort at this moment, the desirability of adding to the men subject to the draft, is because we are discriminating, in the men subject to the present draft, between those who have no dependents and those who have. I think it is a wise discrimination. It may have to go down, like all discriminations; but in enlarging it I think we ought to continue a policy of discrimination, and take our men in such a way as to give the preference to the unmarried men without dependents who can be taken with the least injury to the community, and with the least injury to the community in point of age.

As to the amendment itself, I should be glad to see it adopted now, because the trouble in everything connected with the war since we entered it has been delay; and I think it would be better to determine now what we are going to do for an additional draft so that the work can begin at once upon it, and there need not be 60 or 90 days' delay later, so as to be ready when exhaustion comes of the first class in the present draft. I have heard different periods given as to when it will come; but it may come at any time in three, four, or six months. Why not make ready for it now? It seems to me it would tend to advance the war and save time. We have been prodigal of money; we are prodigal of men; but we have been prodigal of something else far more important than money. We have wasted time, and time is irredeemable. That is the reason why, it seems to me, it would be desirable, in order to have the next extension just as soon as possible, that we should adopt the amendment now. Of course, if the Executive and the administration are against it, I know it will not carry in the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. MARTIN. If it is agreeable to the Senator to yield now, he can resume to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m., Thursday, June 27, 1918) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, June 28, 1918, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 27, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit, for the natural tendency in man, which, in spite of the enigmas and untoward circumstances of life, has ever led him onward to the civilization of our day.

The world is engaged in a mighty conflict; on the one side the forces of evil; on the other the forces of right. After the similitude of Thy servants of old, we stand at Armageddon to battle for the Lord, assured that His sympathy is with those who battle for the right.

Uphold our arms and give us a decisive victory which shall swell the song of the angels into a mighty chorus like the rushing of the floods: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men"; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONFERENCE REPORT, MIGRATORY-BIRD BILL.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report on the bill S. 1553, the migratory-bird bill, for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 25, 1918:

S. 4482. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended.

On June 26, 1918:

H. R. 10297. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CRAMTON. To make a privileged motion to discharge the committee and pass the resolution which I send up.

The SPEAKER. Is this a privileged motion?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it, so that we can see.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 399.

Resolved, That the President be requested to report to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether any order or ruling has been issued or made by the United States Railroad Administration, the War Trade Board, or the War Industries Board with reference to the supply and transportation of materials, products, machinery, or equipment to be used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, or of building material to be used in the erection of buildings and plants for the manufacture of such liquors, or with reference to the export of malt, brewed, vinous, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors, or with reference to the transportation of such liquors by common carriers within the United States or in shipping from ports of the United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to have a point of order reserved——

The SPEAKER. Both gentlemen will suspend for a moment. What was it the gentleman from Tennessee said? There was so much noise the Chair did not hear him.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I desire to ask the gentleman if he knows whether any such order has been made.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am frank to say I do not, and that is the purpose of the resolution. I do understand, however, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it understood the point of order is reserved?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I do understand consideration has been and I hope it is being given to that subject as pertaining to industries generally, but as to this particular industry I am not informed, and hence the resolution.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRAMTON. Of course, I do not understand that the matter is subject to debate, but I am willing to be entirely courteous.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is subject to the point of order, of course, in that it asks for information as to how this is to be used, and the point of order is probably well taken if the gentleman insists upon it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will yield to the gentleman from Louisiana if I may.

Mr. ASWELL. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman if he has made an effort, either by letter or personal visit, to ascertain these facts?

Mr. CRAMTON. Not fully. I think it is a matter comprehensive enough to make it preferable to have the request come from the House.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman think he could get that information by letter?

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin intend to make the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think, Mr. Speaker, we should have a ruling by the Chair on the question whether any Member of this House is privileged to call upon the President in an endeavor to ascertain something that he states that he does not know whether it is in existence or not.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order and ask the privilege of just speaking one or two minutes.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. The point of order is the resolution is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not privileged in that it calls, in effect, for something in the nature of an opinion from the President. Now, it is well established that these resolutions of inquiries, in order to be privileged, must call for facts or information.

The SPEAKER. Now, where does this one call for an opinion?

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that, first, the gentleman has admitted there is not to his knowledge any order in existence. It is in the nature of a fishing expedition.

The SPEAKER. That does not go to this resolution, no difference what he admits.

Mr. STAFFORD. It goes to the fact that the resolution on its face shows there is no order in existence. He does not ask for an order of a certain date, but he makes an inquiry as to whether there is such an order.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not admitted there is none. I admitted that I do not know whether there is one or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Supporting the position that it is based upon opinion, I wish to direct the Speaker's attention to the language in line 7 of the resolution as to whether a ruling has been issued with reference to the supply and transportation of materials, products, machinery, or equipment to be used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. "To be used" requires an expression of opinion on the part of the Executive as to whether the order is to be issued for that purpose or not?

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not an opinion. It is whether the order relates itself to materials to be used for a certain purpose. The order will specify its own terms if it has been issued. It is a matter of fact as to whether a certain order has been issued.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not state in his resolution, upon his right as a Representative, that an order has been issued.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman, if he wants me to, that I think an order ought to be issued.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is it. It is proposed, Mr. Speaker, that the time of the House should be taken up with these privileged resolutions when the committee declines to report them, based on fishing expeditions. The resolution should clearly bring itself within the right to have it privileged in that it calls for facts or information. I contend that when a resolution upon its face makes an inquiry without stating definitely that the order has been issued it is not calling for a fact or information. Why, we could be occupied always with these privileged resolutions, for instance, as to whether the Secretary of the Treasury has issued an order granting free transportation to the soldiers, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The very gist of this resolution is to find out whether such an order has been issued. Of course all the Chair can go by is what is on this sheet of paper. He does not know what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is up to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. Could not the gentleman obtain this information very readily from the President himself?

The SPEAKER. I do not know whether he could or could not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the Chair overrule the point of order?

The SPEAKER. He has not overruled it yet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not care to be heard on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does overrule the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-four Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would it be in order at this point to ask unanimous consent to have the resolution read?

Mr. DYER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it ought to be read, if the gentleman does not know what is in it. The Clerk will read it.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of tabling this resolution will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 142, nays 160, answered "present" 3, not voting 125, as follows:

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. TALBOTT. I voted "nay." I wish to withdraw the vote and be recorded as "present."

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. In the affirmative.

Mr. HARDY. I voted "yea," but I am paired, and I therefore ask to withdraw that vote and vote "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the motion to discharge the committee and agree to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a division. Those in favor of the motion to discharge the committee and pass the resolution will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and twelve gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Ninety-two gentlemen have risen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 112, the noes are 92, and the resolution is agreed to.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for a short time.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. For 15 or 20 minutes, more or less.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not consider it the duty of this side of the House to decide on how important time is at present, but I ask unanimous consent that there be coupled with that request that the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS] be allowed to address the House for an equal amount of time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts couples with the request of the gentleman from Kentucky the request that the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS] have 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to take a recess, as contemplated by the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] yesterday, by Saturday evening, we have got to utilize the time between now and then in considering conference reports on appropriation bills. There are three of these reports now waiting. Three gentlemen are sitting in the Hall now, waiting to call up conference reports—the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] with the naval appropriation bill, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] with the river and harbor bill, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] with the Post Office appropriation bill. I wish these other gentlemen would defer their remarks until we get through with these conference reports. Then if we have time I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman objecting?

Mr. GARNER. I will object for the present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, there are peculiar personal reasons why I should be accorded this consent, and I would be very glad if no gentleman would couple with my request a proposition that would bring forth an objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. GARNER. I objected, Mr. Speaker, because the request was coupled with another.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky renews his request to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. I renew my coupling the other request with it.

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts renews his request.

M POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that these two gentlemen respectively may have 10 minutes each.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that these two gentlemen shall have leave to address the House for 10 minutes each. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 10 minutes.

ANTIPROFITEERING RENT BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I assume that this entire membership is familiar with the status of the antiprofiteering rent bill (H. R. 9248) passed by the House March 12 last. I likewise assume that all are familiar also with the present barnacled condition of the bill. Therefore I deem it not to be necessary at this time to speak of the bill itself in extenso, but rather of the resolution which was offered by Senator POMERENE, of Ohio, and which is now pending before the committee.

The resolution—somewhat lengthy in "whereases"—advises the House that the Senate conferees have been "excused from further service as such conferees until otherwise ordered by the Senate." "Further service" is good, since none had been rendered, and none seemingly contemplated.

However, prior to this I had been advised through the news columns of the local press that senatorial passports were to be handed me and diplomatic relations severed with the House because—

First. I had made some remarks on the floor of the House which were accepted as reflections on a part of the Senate membership; and

Second. That I had violated precedent by submitting to each of the Senate conferees a list of questions indicating the probable points of disagreement which would arise when the conferees on the part of the two Houses met; and Third. That I had written two letters to the conferees which, later, the author of the resolution stated, one gentleman would not write to another gentleman.

Concerning the first—my remarks on the floor of the House—I shall only say that I confined myself to a statement of facts without in any way attempting any conclusions; and I disclaim having said that any Member of the Senate had been paid any of the money which Mr. Worthington, by letter, told his "fellow realtors" had been spent by the National Association of Real Estate Brokers to aid the local association of real estate brokers in its fight in Congress.

As to the author of the resolution now before us, of him particularly, I wish to say that I have never thought for a moment that he got any of the money.

My reason for singling him out for this disclaimer is not because he, in his remarks before the Senate, read from my speech in the House what I said about the money paid by the real estate brokers in their local fight in Congress, nor because he seemed to construe my remarks to mean that he had been paid a part of that money. My reason for singling out this particular Senator for my disclaimer is because it is my opinion that he is not enthusiastically, at least, in sympathy with the tenant class in the legislative controversy now going on. This Senator enjoys the reputation of being capable of thinking intricately and accurately; and, at the same time, his reputation for being able to express his thoughts in writing is just as enviable. In fact, he is conceded to be a man of very much ability.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman in his argument is violating the rules of the House, in that he continues to criticize the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am complimenting him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not hear a single word. The Chair does not know whether the gentleman is discussing the court or the Senate or the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I say, Mr. Speaker, the Senator enjoys the reputation of being capable of thinking intricately and accurately, and at the same time his reputation for being able to express his thoughts in writing is just as enviable. In fact, he is conceded to be a man of very much ability.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state what the fact about the rule is. The rule is that a Member of the House can not discuss a Senator at all, not even compliment him, because if you do compliment him somebody might jump up and say he was the grandest rascal in the country, and you would then have on your hands a debate of a very acrimonious nature. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think there is any danger of that.

Therefore, when I express the opinion that his sympathies are not with the tenant class I do so from as careful and as thoughtful a digestion of what he has written on the subject as, by comparison, my poor abilities will permit. Broadly stated, not sympathizing with the tenant class when in controversy with the landlord class, is no legal offense. For that lack of sympathy with the tenant class which I accord or impute to him he has perfect right. My right not to be in sympathy with the landlord class is no greater than is his to be with them.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEEKER. Does this refer to a Senator?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not hear.

Mr. MEEKER. Something is being said about some man.

The SPEAKER. The Chair just stated the rule.

Mr. MEEKER. I am going to object.

The SPEAKER. You have a perfect right to object if the gentleman is exceeding the rule.

Mr. MEEKER. I make the point of order that he is out of order.

The SPEAKER. What word does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. MEEKER. He is referring to the Senator from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the rule over again. Under the rule a Member of the House can not discuss the action of a Senator in the Senate; but what he does outside of the Senate a Member of the House has just as much right to discuss as he has to discuss the action of any other citizen of the Republic; and the gentleman from Kentucky will please keep himself within the lines of the rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I freely admit that under present conditions I am a partisan in the cause of the tenant. If I were to say that he is a partisan on the other side of the question, I would impute to him nothing that I do not assume for myself. With all of a plentiful energy I have enlisted with the tenant in the fight of which Mr. Worthington wrote his "fellow realtors."

In drafting a bill for the relief of the tenant in his present extremity I gave it all the effort and thought of which I am capable. If what I wrote will not accomplish that end, neither the tenant nor I have yet discovered the failure.

On the other hand, if the amendment known as the Pomerene bill protects the tenant from extortion, the discovery has been made only by the landlords and its author.

Since the appearance of the Pomerene bill I have been constrained to believe that in the exercise of my legislative efforts in behalf of the tenant class in the District of Columbia I had to meet the opposition of the able author of that paper, because his seeming sympathies have been for the landlord class. I use the expression "seeming" sympathies; while if his attitude is to be determined by the bill bearing his name, I may safely omit that word.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman state who is the author of that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think any gentleman has the right to inject himself into the middle of my remarks when I am strictly within parliamentary bounds.

The SPEAKER. The only right the gentleman from Missouri has is to raise a point of order that the gentleman from Kentucky is not proceeding in order.

Mr. MEEKER. I make that point.

The SPEAKER. What are the words objected to?

Mr. MEEKER. That the author of this instrument, introduced in another body, was in sympathy with the landlord class.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that is out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Heretofore I have said, and I now repeat my opinion, that another can express himself on paper most accurately, indeed. In doing it he has written that to which the tenant class and their friends object, and that which the landlords and their supporters approve. But that is his right, just as it is mine to write that which is to the interest of the tenant class.

The distinguished personage of whom I speak will agree, I am sure, that the landlords gave me none of the money of which Mr. Worthington wrote his "fellow realtors"; and, just as readily and without any sort of qualification, I shall agree with him that they gave him none. The attitude of each of us toward the bill, as a matter of course, was known to those who had the money to spend in the local fight in Congress. If both he and I got some of the money—and each of us is a good witness, one for the other, that neither got any of it—it did not alter or change the views of either.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask 10 minutes more.

Mr. MEEKER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then I ask leave to extend my remarks.

Mr. MEEKER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks leave to extend his remarks, and the gentleman from Missouri objects. The gentleman from Nevada is recognized for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

WORLD-WIDE WAR FOR DEMOCRACY.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, little did we dream that the sparks from the pistol of that Serbian fanatic, fired at Bosnia on June 28, 1914, had started a conflagration that was soon to envelop the so-called civilized world, and that now, lest we, too, be consumed, can only be quenched with blood, the precious blood of our sons and brothers. When Austria, for reasons of her own, on July 23 of that fateful year sent an ultimatum to the Government at Belgrade, the world for the first time began to realize something of the awful consequences likely to follow. From that time on in quick succession event followed event and nation after nation joined in the conflict. The world was aflame and war mad. Week after week, month after month, and year after year, the war raged and spread. America, the land of promise and the leader of all democracies, to whom the peoples of all nations had come to enjoy the blessings of liberty, dreamed tranquilly on, enjoying hours of sunshine undarkened by the smoke of battle, and sipping the sweet wine of life not yet embittered by the salt of tears. The lowering clouds of war rolled nearer and nearer, but she refused to see, refused to believe, until the clouds had blotted out the sunshine. Peace-loving, proud of her institutions, fearful of becoming involved in entangling foreign alliances, wholly unprepared for modern warfare, and startled from her peaceful calm, through tears she looked to us who make her laws to shape her destiny. Each man of us took counsel with himself before his Maker, earnestly, thoughtfully, prayerfully, and acted as his mind and heart told him to act. We realized on that memorable day that we were all placed in a position where a vote of yea or nay might seal her fate forever. What seemed to be the proper course for one man to pursue seemed to be the wrong course to another. That most vital of all questions was to be decided promptly and without a referendum, and so we looked back at the arguments used during the last general election, the results of which were the only semblance of an index we had to the feelings of our people.

Since the world began no two men have thought exactly alike, and so there never have been two ideas or opinions on great public questions exactly alike. A state of fact exists, but by the time it is strained through the consciousness of two persons it has become two opinions, and nobody knows the why or wherefore of the change. All men recognize the existence of this nebulous "no man's land" called opinion, but, oddly enough, they can not learn to tolerate the mote in their brother's eye, and to them the unpardonable sin is a difference of opinion.

To justify themselves in the eyes of the world some people claim that the only way to be safe in political life is to hold tenaciously to the opinion that happens to be popular, to forsake that opinion when it comes into disfavor, and to stifle the promptings of one's own conscience and heart when those promptings happen to conflict with expediency. We all know men in high places who are prone to adopt an opinion or policy in much the same manner as a woman adopts a new hat—because it happens to be the fashion—and these same men are ever ready to discard that opinion clumsily or adroitly, according to the degree of their cleverness, the very minute it becomes unfashionable. How many times we have seen this done! It is an easy trick to perform, this camouflaging of an idea so that its own father would never recognize it, and we all know that it has saved more elections than all other tricks put together; but there are occasions more serious than elections when a man can not resort to it. There are times when a man has to stand firmly to his convictions even though he is in a lonely minority and runs the risk of being called "willful." [Applause.]

Made up, as we are, of people from every country on the face of the globe, it is but natural that prior to our entrance into this war there were strong divisions of sentiment as to the best course to pursue in order to maintain our rights and our neutrality, safeguard our citizens, and perpetuate our institutions with the aim best to serve the general interests of mankind. Questions of great national and international policy in both Houses of Congress during the past four years have been presented and debated pro and con. And so they should be in a democracy like ours. Men should voice and vote their convictions, and, in addition to their individual opinions, they should not forget that they are only the Representatives of the people who have sent them here. There should be no recriminations, no casting of aspersions at each other, for patriotism is not confined to any one man or any one party, and no man and no party has the right to claim a monopoly of that virtue. [Applause.]

When a man wraps the Stars and Stripes about him for political purposes on every slightest pretext and loudly proclaims that he is the only 100 per cent patriot it is a pretty safe proposition that he is as bogus as a wooden Indian [applause], for in a matter like this there is deep and honest conviction and sincerity on both sides. The great leader of the Democratic majority in this House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], than whom no man in this membership is more dearly enshrined in our hearts, the late Senator Stone, Democratic chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in that other legislative branch of Congress, who for his devotion to his duty now sleeps the sleep that knows no waking, as well as that patriotic and loyal Republican, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], who now holds the position as ranking member on the Committee on Foreign Affairs in this House, differed honestly, loyally, and patriotically with the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and of this Republic. The Speaker of this House, Hon. CHAMP CLARK, whose Americanism, common-sense judgment, and blunt expressions of honest convictions make him the idol of the American people, has at times voiced his opposition to some of the policies advocated by the Chief Executive. It is such men as these who make the spirit of democracy what it is, and we must not forget that it is for this spirit that we are fighting. [Applause.]

War is now on. The earth is shaken with the tramp, tramp, tramp of our boys in khaki, those smiling boys who come from every corner of the land and go as one man to uphold the honor of their country. Behind them our differences are forgotten, and we join hands as we wish them Godspeed. It is no time or place longer to debate the question as to whether we should have declared war against Germany when Belgium was invaded and made the "cockpit" of Europe or whether the world would sooner have been made safe for democracy had we promptly declared war when the Lusitania, laden with men, women, and children, was ruthlessly torpedoed and sunk.

Let high administration officials stick to their posts of duty instead of going around the country at the Government's expense, politically applying the acid test to loyalty and patriotism. Let the dead past bury its dead. "Act, act in the living present, heart within and God overhead." In a democracy such as ours some one must lead, and the President of the United States is our leader. Let us get behind him. Let us refrain from idly criticizing his motives, and at the same time let him refrain from criticizing ours. [Applause.] Let all criticism, if criticize we must, be constructive and not destructive. I have never during my four terms of service in this House questioned the motives or patriotism of any Member of Congress because he differed with me on public policy or public questions, and I would rather resign from this body than to do so. I do not believe that there is a Member of either of the legislative branches of Congress who would not give up all that life holds near and dear to him if the time should come when his country needs it. Let us quit fighting among ourselves and fall in line behind the boys who are fighting to protect, uphold, and preserve our country in the great cause in which we are engaged. It is no longer merely a question of the lives and happiness of individuals, but it has become a question of the life or death of this Republic. As for me, although I did everything within my power to avert this war, even to the extent of voting against it, I am in favor of fighting for an honorable and lasting peace if it costs the last dollar of American money and takes the last drop of American blood. I would rather lay down my life on the blood-soaked fields of France than to have my constituents, my children, and my children's children misunderstand my motives. [Applause.]

DEPARTMENTAL EMPLOYEES LIABLE TO MILITARY SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a communication in response to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], which, with the accompanying document, is ordered to be printed in the RECORD and lie on the Speaker's table.

The document is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 22, 1918.

The SPEAKER,
The House of Representatives.

SIR: In compliance with House resolution 381, dated June 3, 1918, I transmit herewith a list of employees in the service of the Treasury Department who were, on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked and allowed. There are approximately 42,400 employees in the service of the Treasury Department. Exemptions or deferred classifications have been requested and allowed in the cases of 595. Of these 268 are in the departmental service and 327 are in the various field services of the department throughout the country. It will be noted that of those in the departmental service 225 are plate printers, plate cleaners, and transferrers in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. On account of the scarcity of men qualified as plate printers, plate cleaners, and transferrers it has been necessary to ask for the exemption or deferred classification of all the men in the bureau of draft age so qualified. Otherwise it would have been impossible to execute the great volume of work in connection with the liberty bonds and other Government securities incident to the war. Exemptions in the field services were handled by officials designated for the respective States and Territories in accordance with the regulations of the Provost Marshal General.

Respectfully,

L. S. ROWE,
Acting Secretary.

List of employees in the Treasury Department whose exemption from military duty or deferred classification has been asked by the department and allowed.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill we passed yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill passed yesterday. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman already has that privilege under leave procured by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HARDY. I did not know that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman already has that privilege.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, but pending that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, wants to ask to take from the Speaker's table a bill, with Senate amendments, and ask for a conference, and I will yield to him not exceeding five minutes to do that by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee notifies the House that the gentleman from North Carolina may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 10653) and agree to the request of the Senate for a further conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 10653) and agree to the request of the Senate for a further conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SMALL, Mr. BOOHER, and Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio rose.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] willing to give way to the gentleman from Ohio for a similar purpose and under similar conditions?

Mr. PADGETT. Five minutes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table an omnibus pension bill (S. 3798), to insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 3798) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to insist on the House amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I ask a similar order on S. 4193 and S. 4542.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks a similar order on the two bills, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 4193) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, and the bill (S. 4542) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on each bill Mr. KEY of Ohio, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10843. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 9641. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 10924. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 9506. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 10358. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 11658. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4127. An act to authorize the W. M. Ritter Lumber Co., a corporation, to construct bridges across the branches and tributaries of the Big Sandy River and their tributaries, in the counties of Buchanan and Dickenson, in the State of Virginia.

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 696) ON THE NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 10854, the naval appropriation bill, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think the report is more illuminating than the statement, and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5 and 53.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 34, 35, 38, 39, 41, 42, 102, and 115, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That the act approved August 29, 1916, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes' (Stats. L., vol. 39, ch. 417, pp. 573, 574), be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of said act following the caption 'Naval Dental Corps' on page 573, but preceding the caption 'Dental Reserve Corps,' on page 574, and by substituting therefor the following:

"'That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint and commission, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dental officers in the Navy at the rate of one for each thousand of the total authorized number of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, in the grades of assistant dental surgeon, passed assistant dental surgeon, and dental surgeon, who shall constitute the Naval Dental Corps, and shall be a part of the Medical Department of the Navy. Original appointments to the Naval Dental Corps shall be made in the grade of assistant dental surgeon with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade), and all dental officers now in the Dental Corps appointed under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 22, 1912 (Stats. L., vol. 36, p. 345), or under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916 (Stats. L., vol. 39, p. 573), or who may hereafter be appointed, shall take rank and precedence with officers of the Naval Medical Corps of the same rank according to the dates of their respective commissions or original appointments, and all such dental officers shall be eligible for advancement in grade and rank in the same manner and under the same conditions as officers of the Naval Medical Corps with or next after whom they take precedence, and shall receive the same pay and allowances as officers of corresponding rank and length of service in the Naval Medical Corps up to and including the rank of lieutenant commander: Provided, That dental surgeons shall be eligible for advancement in pay and allowances, but not in rank, to and including the pay and allowances of commander and captain, subject to such examinations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, except that the number of dental surgeons with the pay and allowances of captain shall not exceed 4½ per cent and the number of dental surgeons with the pay and allowances of commander shall not exceed 8 per cent of the total authorized number of dental officers: Provided further, That dental surgeons shall be eligible for advancement to the pay and allowances of commander and captain when their total active service as dental officers in the Navy is such that if rendered as officers of the Naval Medical Corps, it would place them in the list of medical officers with the pay and allowances of commander or captain, as the case may be. And provided further, That dental officers who shall have gained or lost numbers on the Navy list shall be considered to have gained or lost service accordingly; and the time served by dental officers on active duty as acting assistant dental surgeons and assistant dental surgeons under provisions of law existing prior to the passage of this act shall be reckoned in computing the increased service pay and service for precedence and promotion of dental officers herein authorized or heretofore appointed.'

"All appointees authorized by this act shall be citizens of the United States between 21 and 32 years of age, and shall be graduates of standard medical or dental colleges and trained in the several branches of dentistry, and shall, before appointment, have successfully passed mental, moral, physical and professional examinations before medical and professional examining boards appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and have been recommended for appointment by such boards: Provided, That hereafter no person shall be appointed as assistant dental surgeon in the Navy who is not a graduate of a standard medical or dental college.

"Officers of the Naval Dental Corps shall become eligible for retirement in the same manner and under the same conditions as now prescribed by law for officers of the Naval Medical Corps, except that section 1445 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be applicable to dental officers, and they shall no be entitled to rank above lieutenant commander on the retired list, or to retired pay above that of captain.

"All dental officers now serving under probationary appointments shall become immediately eligible for permanent appointment under the provisions of this act, subject to the examinations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy for original appointment as dental officers, and may be appointed assistant dental surgeon with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) to rank from the date of their probationary appointments: Provided, That the senior dental officer now at the United States Naval Academy shall not be displaced by the provisions of this act, and he shall hereafter have the grade of dental surgeon and the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant commander, and he shall not be eligible for retirement before he has reached the age of 70 years, except for physical disability incurred in the line of duty: Provided further, That no dental officer in the Navy who on original appointment as dental officer was over 40 years of age shall be eligible for retirement before he has reached the age of 70 years, except for physical disability incurred in line of duty.

"All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act relating to the Dental Corps of the Navy are hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to legislate out of the service any officer now in the Medical Department of the Navy or to reduce the rank, pay, or allowances now authorized by law for any officer of the Navy."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 93: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 93, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$2,500,000" and insert "$1,000,000" and add the following proviso: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for this purpose not to exceed $1,500,000 in addition to the appropriations herein made." Strike out "$2,525,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$1,025,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 112: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 112, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "49,999,375" and in lieu thereof insert "$46,694,375"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 120: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 120, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized during the period of the present war to promote temporarily, with the advice and consent of the Senate, commissioned line officers and engineer officers of the United States Coast Guard below the rank and grades of captain and captain of engineers to the ranks and grades of the Coast Guard not above captain and captain of engineers, respectively, without regard to number or length of service in rank or grade: Provided, That such temporary promotions may be to such rank and grade in the Coast Guard not above captain or captain of engineers as correspond to the rank and grade that may be attained in accordance with law, either permanently or temporarily, by line officers of the Regular Navy of the same length of total service: Provided further, That constructors of the Coast Guard now authorized by law who shall have had as much total service in the Coast Guard as the officer of the Construction Corps of the Navy at the foot of the permanent or temporary list of those with the rank of lieutenant commanders may be temporarily promoted to the rank of captain of the Coast Guard: And provided further, That for the purposes of this act service in the Coast Guard to be counted must have been continuous: And provided further, That nothing contained in this paragraph shall operate to disturb the relative position of officers in the Coast Guard with reference to precedence or promotion, but all such officers otherwise qualified shall be advanced in rank with or ahead of officers in the Coast Guard who were their juniors on the date of this act.

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized during the period of the present war to promote temporarily, with the advice and consent of the Senate, the captain commandant of the Coast Guard to the rank of commodore in the Navy and brigadier general in the Army, and the engineer in chief of the Coast Guard to the rank of captain in the Navy and colonel in the Army, officers of the Coast Guard holding permanent commissions above the rank and grade of first lieutenant and first lieutenant of engineers as follows: Not to exceed two-fifths of the captains authorized by law, and not to exceed one-third of the captains of engineers authorized by law, to have the rank of senior captain in the Coast Guard; and not to exceed one-third the senior captains authorized by law, to have the rank of captain in the Navy and colonel in the Army: Provided, That the senior captains, captains, and captains of engineers to be temporarily promoted as herein provided, shall be selected as provided by law for promotion by selection in the Navy.

"That during the period of the present war, the senior district superintendent, the three district superintendents next in order of seniority, the four district superintendents next below these three in order of seniority, and the junior five district superintendents shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of captain, first lieutenant, second lieutenant, and third lieutenant in the Coast Guard, respectively.

"That the permanent and probationary commissions of officers of the Coast Guard shall not be vacated by reason of the temporary promotions and advancements authorized by this act, nor shall said officers be prejudiced in their relative lineal rank in regard to their promotion as provided for in existing law: Provided, That no officer who shall receive a temporary promotion or advancement under this act shall be entitled to pay or allowances except under such promotion or advancement: Provided further, That upon the temination of the temporary promotions and advancements authorized by this act, the officers so promoted and advanced shall revert to the rank and grade from which temporarily promoted or advanced, unless such officers in the meantime, in accordance with law, become entitled to promotion to a higher grade or rank in the permanent Coast Guard, in which case they shall revert to said higher grade or rank, and shall, after passing the prescribed examinations, be commissioned accordingly.

"That all temporary promotions and advancements authorized by this act shall continue in force only until otherwise directed by the President, and not later than six months after the termination of the present war.

"That any officer of the Coast Guard temporarily promoted or advanced in grade or rank in accordance with the provisions of this act who shall be retired from active service under his permanent commission while holding such temporary grade or rank, except for physical disability incurred in line of duty, shall be placed on the retired list with the grade or rank to which his position in the permanent Coast Guard at the date of his retirement would entitle him.

"That officers of the United States Coast Guard on sea duty or on shore duty beyond the continental limits of the United States during the period of the present war shall receive the same increase of pay and allowances in all respects as are now or may hereafter be provided by law for officers of the Navy of corresponding rank.

"That nothing contained in this act relating to the Coast Guard shall operate to reduce the rank, pay, or allowances that would have been received by any person in the Coast Guard except for the passage of this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments of the Senate numbered 37, 47, 52, and 170 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted by the accompanying report on the amendments of the Senate, namely:

The Senate recedes on amendments Nos. 5 and 53.

The House recedes on amendments Nos. 34, 35, 38, 39, 41, 42, 102, and 115.

The House recedes with an amendment on amendments 23, 93, 100, 112, and 120.

Of the amendments upon which the House recedes, Nos. 34, 35, 38, 39, 41, 42, and 115 were dependent upon Senate amendment numbered 33, which the House had agreed to, and these amendments were simply in conformity with and perfecting the amendment numbered 33.

On amendments Nos. 102 and 112: Simply change totals.

On amendment No. 23: Relates to the Dental Corps, and the conferees agreed to the same with amendments limiting the rank to lieutenant commander instead of commander, as provided in the Senate amendment, and striking out the provision requiring confirmation by the Senate, and making verbal changes to conform to the amendment limiting the rank to lieutenant commander. While the rank is limited to lieutenant commander, provision is made for pay and allowances to the rank of commander and captain.

On amendment No. 93: Is for the development of a submarine base at Key West, Fla. As agreed to by the conferees, it reduces the appropriation from $2,500,000 to $1,000,000, with an additional authorization for $1,500,000.

On amendment No. 100: Provides for the construction of a railroad to connect with the Indianhead proving ground and powder factory to afford rail communication with the proving ground and powder factory, and increases the appropriation as authorized by the House from $550,000 to $850,000.

On amendment No. 120: Is legislation providing for the temporary promotion during the war of the officers of the Coast Guard which under existing law during the period of the war are operating with and under the Navy. This amendment provides temporary promotion so as to give needed and just recognition and promotion for their service in the Navy.

On amendments Nos. 37, 47, 52, and 170: Are still in disagreement.

L. P. PADGETT,
J. FRED. C. TALBOTT,
D. J. RIORDAN,
THOMAS S. BUTLER,
WM. J. BROWNING,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the chairman of the committee kindly inform the House before he moves the previous question as to what additional cost will be levied on the Treasury of the United States by reason of the promotions in the Dental Corps authorized under the amendment that has been agreed to, and also the increased cost by reason of the promotion in the rank and pay in the Coast Guard Service.

Mr. PADGETT. Speaking first of the Dental Corps, it would be impossible to give that accurately because it will increase from time to time as the naval personnel increases.

Mr. STAFFORD. Assuming, for the purpose of the gentleman's estimate, that there is one dental surgeon for every 1,000 enlisted men, as the amendment provides and as the existing law provides, what additional charge will be levied on the Treasury by reason of these promotions? As I understand, under the existing law the assistant dental surgeon goes in at the grade of junior lieutenant and has to remain five years and then he is advanced to the full grade of lieutenant and has to remain there 15 years before further promotion.

Mr. PADGETT. No; there is no limitation of law as to 15 years; that was simply a slow promotion that was existing, but there was no limit to the law fixing it at 15 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I remember reading the law to the House when the matter was last under consideration, it expressly provided that before a person could be advanced to the grade next to lieutenant he had to be in the corps a further 15 years. My memory may not be accurate about it; it may have been 20 years, but it was certainly, as I recollect, not less than 15 years.

Mr. PADGETT. I would not say for sure, but I was under the impression that after he was advanced in the junior grade there was no number of years fixed.

Mr. STAFFORD. The law provides that the assistant dental surgeon should go into the junior-lieutenant grade and remain five years, and then be promoted to full lieutenant and remain 15 or 20 years, certainly 15 years, before he was advanced to a higher grade, and that there could only be 4 per cent advanced to the grade of commander in the Dental Corps.

Mr. PADGETT. The Dental Corps does not go up to commander under existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, 4 per cent to the next grade above lieutenant.

Mr. PADGETT. Lieutenant commander.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well, lieutenant commander.

Mr. PADGETT. And the amendment agreed to by the Senate conferees and as reported here limits the rank to lieutenant commander, but does not limit the pay, but allows the pay of commander or captain.

Mr. STAFFORD. How long will the assistant dental surgeon be in the grade of junior lieutenant before he is advanced to full lieutenant, and then from full lieutenant to lieutenant commander, and then commander, under the provisions as agreed to by the conferees?

Mr. DYER. He does not get to be commander.

Mr. PADGETT. That will depend on the flow of promotions. There is no limit to the number of years in the different grades. The Navy is expanding so largely that they have to take care of these men and have promotions to maintain the proper organization in the Dental Corps.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is what I am seeking information upon. What determines the number of dental surgeons in the respective grades?

Mr. PADGETT. That is fixed by the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the amendment saying how long they shall remain in the grade of junior lieutenant or full lieutenant before they are advanced.

Mr. PADGETT. Nothing as to the length of time, but the proportion is fixed; they only get promotion by seniority as the vacancies occur or as the Navy is expanded. The total number is increased here; it is the percentage of the increase, the number in such a grade, and if that number did not exist in the highest grade there would be promotions from the next lower to fill it up, and then there would be promotions from below to fill up those vacancies.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman point out the phraseology that limits the number of men in the respective grades of lieutenants in this Dental Surgeons' Corps?

Mr. PADGETT. The Clerk read it just a moment ago:

> Except that the number of dental surgeons with the pay and allowances of captain shall not exceed 4½ per cent, and the number of dental surgeons with the pay and allowances of commander shall not exceed 8 per cent of the total authorized number of dental officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I was fully acquainted with that limitation before I asked the question. I now wish the gentleman to direct my attention to the language which shows any limitation upon the number that may be in the grade of junior lieutenant or full lieutenant or lieutenant commander. I am seeking to ascertain how many promotions there will be and how much additional charge this amendment will be on the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PADGETT. I can not tell the gentleman how rapidly the promotions will take place, and I can not tell the gentleman the aggregate cost it will be to the Treasury. That will depend, as I stated, upon the number of men that go into the service and the increases as they are made and distributed in the various ranks.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me to interrupt, I think the legislation states that the dental surgeons shall be eligible for advancement according to length of service, the same as the naval medical officers.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. How are they advanced?

Mr. PADGETT. Under the act of August 29, 1916, they are distributed in various grades in certain percentages, and they have the running-mate provision here that carries these men along with the Medical Corps.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it not the fact that in the medical branch of the naval service, after service of a certain length of time, they are arbitrarily advanced a certain grade?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. And you propose to carry these dental surgeons in the same way?

Mr. PADGETT. Up to the rank of lieutenant commander.

Mr. ANTHONY. So that the promotions do not depend upon vacancies at the top, but you are going to arbitrarily promote them.

Mr. PADGETT. They go with the running mate in the Medical Corps.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does that not make a rather rapid flow of promotions?

Mr. PADGETT. It will for the present; yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas has furnished me the information that I was seeking to get from the gentleman from Tennessee. It merely shows that there is going to be very rapid promotions of these men to the grade of lieutenant commander, no matter what length of service they may have had, whereas under existing law they could not get into that grade unless they had 20 years of service in the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes; it will be a much shorter time than that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Surely.

Mr. PADGETT. For instance, the act of August 29, 1916, provides that the distribution shall be one-half medical director with the rank of rear admiral, to four medical directors with the rank of captain, to eight medical inspectors with the rank of commander, to eighty-seven and a half in the grades below medical inspector. That is the distribution that would take place. When these men go into the Dental Corps, they have the date of their commissions; and in the Medical Corps an officer that has the same date of commission would be his running mate, and as the man in the Medical Corps is advanced this man would be advanced in the Dental Corps, and as he is retarded he will be held back. In the expansion of the Medical Corps that has already been authorized it is very great, because the enlargement is necessary for the exigencies of the war, and these men will go along with them in the permanent corps.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee state the reason for providing such a large number of dental surgeons with the high rank and high pay and allowances of captain? As I understand it, under this bill there will be about 12.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. That would be entitled to that rank, which is equivalent to that of a colonel in the Army. What is the necessity for that?

Mr. PADGETT. Not the rank, but the pay.

Mr. ANTHONY. They have the rank of lieutenant commander and the pay and allowances of a captain, which is equivalent to that of a colonel in the Army. Why should you have 12 men of that rank and pay?

Mr. PADGETT. That is a very small number when you take into consideration the number of men in the Dental Corps in the Medical Corps of the Navy.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it not true that the dentists will be widely scattered in their service?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Where is the need for the exercise of command of men of the rank of lieutenant commander?

Mr. PADGETT. It is not command. In the Staff Corps they do not exercise command.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the object of having 12 men of that high pay? What do any of these men do that they should get it?

Mr. PADGETT. Those men get it as opportunity for advancement and promotion in pay—compensattion for their length of service and for their ability.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me call the gentleman's attention to another thing. He provides that 4½ per cent of the total number of dental officers shall be eligible to this high rank and pay.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. My recollection is that the percentage in the Army in the dental service is 3 per cent. Why make this high rank in the Navy 4½ per cent?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know what the Army percentage is.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is 3 per cent.

Mr. PADGETT. The Army gives them the actual rank of colonel and the pay of colonel.

Mr. ANTHONY. You give them the pay.

Mr. PADGETT. We give them the pay, but do not give them the rank.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. We do not give the rank of commander, which is the relative rank of lieutenant colonel. You are giving in the Army two ranks above what we are giving in the Navy.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the argument for providing this larger number or greater percentage than the Army does?

Mr. PADGETT. In the Army, on the basis of a million and a half or two million men, 3 per cent affords an opportunity for a very large number, and with 131 dentists 4½ per cent is a very small number.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will call the gentleman's attention to this fact: In the Navy of 300,000 you are going to give 12 men here the pay and allowance of a colonel. In the Army, with 3,000,000, we are going to give a very much less comparative number.

Mr. PADGETT. Of course, the difference is between 3 and 4½ per cent, but in the aggregate it is much greater. I did not know, I am frank to say to the gentleman—I did not know that your Army was limited to that, but we put this because we thought in this service there ought to be an opportunity for men who have had long service to reach that compensation.

Mr. ANTHONY. I called attention to this, because I am confident from past experience that following the enactment of this legislation fixing 4½ per cent the Army dental surgeons will demand the same thing.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the warrant for this legislation. Last year in the closing days of the session, through the influence of some outside source, they tacked on in the Senate an insignificant little bill that had passed the House months before this provision providing for an increase of the Dental Corps of the Army. It was brought over here within two hours of adjournment. It had never been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. Members of the Committee on Military Affairs protested. No one knew anything about the relative merits of it. An attempt was made by a few to have the conference report disagreed to, but in the closing hours you know how difficult that it. Now, here again we are having a matter considered on a naval bill that has never been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House. Ten minutes of time was given to it in a hearing before the House conferees, nothing further.

Mr. PADGETT. We had very careful consideration in the conference.

Mr. STAFFORD. Ten minutes hearings before the House committee on conference.

Mr. PADGETT. No; the conferees considered it, and personally I went and talked with the Surgeon General. I talked with the Secretary of the Navy, and I went to some of the higher officers in the Army to find out about the operation of rank in the Army, and it was looked into pretty thoroughly.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. DYER. I just want to refer to the remark of the gentleman from Wisconsin that there had been no effort made by anybody to secure legislation for the Dental Corps of the Army.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I did not make that remark. I made no such remark. I made the remark that the Committee on Naval Affairs had not considered this legislation.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman said that an item in reference to the Dental Corps of the Army——

Mr. STAFFORD. I say that again.

Mr. DYER (continuing). Was put on in the last few minutes here without any consideration. The fact the committee did not report that bill does not make it unnecessary to have legislation. The Senate saw fit to pass that and everybody knows that it is very much needed. Now, this matter has been considered most carefully not only by the Senate committee but by the conferees of the House. They had hearings; they went into this matter very carefully largely at the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Hearings of 10 minutes, when the Secretary of the Navy stated that the demand did not come from him and did not have his approval.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not mistaken. I read the hearings, and the gentleman from Missouri has not read the hearings, I dare say.

Mr. DYER. I have read the hearings, and I know a good deal about this legislation. This bill with reference to the Dental Corps has been carefully considered by the Secretary of the Navy—that is, the Naval Department—and they recommend the legislation. They sent down here a draft of the bill. It was introduced in the Senate by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and was introduced in the House by myself, and that is substantially——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to these two gentlemen?

Mr. DYER. That is substantially the legislation that is——

Mr. PADGETT. I am letting the debate run for the present.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make another inquiry for the purpose of obtaining information. The total number of these dental surgeons is based upon the total authorized number of enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps. Does that mean the permanent enlisted force or rather the total force that may be enlisted in time of emergency and during the war?

Mr. PADGETT. No; it is the permanent authorized strength, not the war-emergency strength.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to know something about the same thing. As I understand it, this calls for one dental surgeon for every 1,000 men in the Navy and Marine Corps?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does that include the Naval Reserves?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If there were 400,000 men, there would be 400 of these dental surgeons?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir. The authorized strength of the Navy is fixed in this bill, increasing it from 87,000 to 131,485, and then the permanent strength of the Marine Corps is 17,400. That would make 149,000, in round numbers, and that would give 149 dentists.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In other words, the personnel of this particular corps of officers would be fixed on the normal ordinary strength of the Navy and Marine Corps and not on the war strength?

Mr. PADGETT. It is fixed on the authorized strength, which is the normal strength.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I direct the attention of the chairman to the amendment providing for increased rank and promotion to the members of the Coast Guard, and inquire what additional charge the giving of additional pay to those in that service will be levied on the Treasury?

Mr. PADGETT. The senior district superintendent, the three district superintendents next in order, the four district superintendents next below these, and the five junior district superintendents, as set out in the tabulated statements, would make a total increased cost per annum of $6,493.50.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that the only increased charge on the Treasury resulting from the adoption of this amendment that the conferees have agreed to?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; it is not, by any means. Under section 1 of the bill, as I stated when the bill was before the House at the time of the adoption of the other partial conference report, a number of these men will be promoted from lieutenant to captain, and others will be promoted from second lieutenant to lieutenant, and some will be promoted from third lieutenant to second lieutenant.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I understand the amendment, it provides for a wholesale promotion of all the officers of the Coast Guard Service, whether on the high seas, on the inland waters, or wherever they may be?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; it does provide for a very general promotion. And you will bear in mind that in a former debate I stated that the matter was discussed and the committee at first hesitated about reporting it, for the reason that it appeared to be giving a "Salvador army"—all up at the top. I called attention to the fact that we had now 31 captains and it would promote to 78 captains, but I called attention at the same time to the hearing that we had with Admiral Palmer, of the Navy, in which he stated that these were valuable men; that they were no longer acting and operating as Coast Guard units, but they were distributed in the Navy; and that they possessed the qualifications for this promotion by their length of sea service; and that during the war they would have the temporary promotion to captains and lieutenants, as I explained.

Mr. STAFFORD. What additional charge will those promotions make upon the Treasury each year?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know; but it will be a considerable charge.

Mr. STAFFORD. One hundred thousand dollars or more?

Mr. PADGETT. I suppose from $50,000 to $100,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand that these promotions are temporary and only for the period of the war?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And then the officers will revert to their former rank?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report on the amendment.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up amendment No. 37.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, after line 6, strike out the following:

"The rank and title of major general is hereby created in the Marine Corps, and the President is authorized to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one major general, who shall at all times be junior in rank to the major general commandant, and also one temporary major general in the Marine Corps, who shall at all times be junior to the permanent major general."

And insert the following:

During the period of the present war the commandant of the Marine Corps shall have the rank and title of lieutenant general commandant and shall receive the pay and allowances of a lieutenant general in the Army, and the rank and title of major general is hereby created in the Marine Corps, and the President is authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one permanent and one temporary major general: Provided, That the major generals of the Marine Corps, both line and staff, shall at all times be junior in rank to the commandant.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with the following amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to recede and concur with an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PADGETT moves that the House recede from its disagreement with the amendment of the Senate No. 37 and concur in the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the Senate amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, in his decretion, if he deems it for the good of the service, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, temporarily to promote and commission, during the period of the present war, the commandant of the Marine Corps to the rank and title of lieutenant general commandant, who shall receive, during such temporary promotion, the pay and allowances of a lieutenant general in the Army, and the rank and title of major general is hereby created in the Marine Corps, and the President is authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one permanent and one temporary major general: Provided, That the major generals of the Marine Corps, both line and staff, shall at all times be junior in rank to the commandant."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to state in the presence of the gentleman that I have no objection to the gentleman addressing the House all he pleases, but his remarks this morning obviously tended to create ill feeling between this House and the Senate, which the rules do not permit. I am perfectly willing he should extend his remarks in the RECORD if before they are extended the Speaker passes on whether or not they are parliamentary.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Fairchild, G. W.	Kelley, Mich.	Russell
Bacharach	Farr	Kless, Pa.	Sabath

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 298 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DRANE, for one day, on account of important business; and

To Mr. HAUGEN (at the request of Mr. TOWNER), for three days, on account of important business.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 37 and concur in the amendment. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The affirmative side of the question was taken.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understood that there was to be debate on that amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. Does the gentleman desire some time?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not know that I am entitled to time.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The point of order is that the Chair had put the question and one side had voted.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Tennessee any proposition to make?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor. Does the gentleman from Minnesota want some time?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to have some time. I think the time should be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing this amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. No one has asked for time on this side. I asked if the gentleman from Minnesota desires some time?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. KEATING. I would like to have some time when you get down to it.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PADGETT moves that the House recede from its disagreement with the amendment of the Senate No. 37, and concur in the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the Senate amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, in his discretion, if he deems it for the good of the service, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, temporarily to promote and commission, during the period of the present war, the commandant of the Marine Corps to the rank and title of lieutenant general commandant, who shall receive, during such temporary promotion, the pay and allowances of a lieutenant general in the Army; and the rank and title of major general is hereby created in the Marine Corps, and the President is authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one permanent and one temporary major general: Provided, That the major generals of the Marine Corps, both line and staff, shall at all times be junior in rank to the commandant."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, that is a reincorporation of the House provision.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee want to debate it or not? If not, the Chair will put the question.

Mr. PADGETT. Does the gentleman from Minnesota want 10 minutes' time?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like the gentleman to explain to the House why he asks that. Otherwise I will be glad to proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The amendment says: "Provided, That the major generals of the Marine Corps, both line and staff." There is no major general of the Marine Corps, line or staff. There is not any there. That is the question that occasions the trouble here. The language to which I have called attention is this: "Provided, That the major generals of the Marine Corps, both line and staff."

Mr. PADGETT. I ask unanimous consent to strike out "both line and staff."

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; that ought to go out. If that stays in there, there is no use in this discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to modify the amendment by striking out the words "both line and staff." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is the identical proposition that was before the House last week and was defeated after full discussion by a vote of almost 2 to 1.

Those of us who objected to this unheard-of and unprecedented proceeding expected that it would reappear, and probably in a new form. Our expectation has been realized. It is here in a new form, in a subtle form, in a form that it is expected will perhaps deceive the House and go through. I do not mean to say that in an obnoxious sense. The purpose of the lobby back of this is to get it through anyhow, and they are in hopes that no discussion would occur on this amendment and that the House might agree to it. The new form—and that which we may call the sugar-coated pill—is that the buck is passed up to the President.

Now, gentlemen, pause for a moment and see the idiocy of it—and I use no less a term to describe the proceeding. The President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He has not been slow in exercising the duties of that position. He is perfectly competent to act whenever he sees that action is necessary. The President has not asked for this legislation. The responsible head of the Navy, upon whose judgment the President would naturally rely before he asked Congress to pass this legislation, is on record as opposed to it, saying that it serves no military purpose. Therefore the President has not seen fit to recommend this legislation to Congress or to ask for it. And it is proposed to turn this over to the President with the suggestion that the President carry it out. The initiative of such a military move should come from the President or from some military source. This does not; rather is it opposed by the Secretary of the Navy, the responsible military head of the Marine Corps. The Secretary rightly says the passage of this can serve no military purpose. Then, I ask, what purpose is in mind to serve? Any other purpose must be an improper purpose. This does not spring from military sources, and will serve no military purpose. Then Congress should not pass it; emphatically not. For us to dodge the matter by passing it up to the President in this way is ridiculous. It is a piece of monumental cowardice on the part of the House to attempt such a proceeding. This thing is either right or it is wrong. If it is right, let Congress do it. If it is wrong, let Congress squarely defeat it; and let me submit again that it is wrong. Its passage in this form would subject the President to the importunities of the lobby that is at work for this law. We should save the President from that annoyance and that embarrassment. The other day I outlined quite fully my objections to this law. I am not going to repeat them here. Let me, however, refresh your recollection of one or two of the vital points that are concerned. It is proposed by this to make two major generals in the Marine Corps——

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman permit me right there just to eliminate that? There is nothing involved here except the promotion of Gen. Barnett from major general to lieutenant general during the period of the war, and to authorize the President to do it. The House has already passed the two major generals.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. When did the House do that?

Mr. PADGETT. It passed it when it passed the bill on the 21st of May.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They are all in the same paragraph. The gentleman has got them in this proposed amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. I know it, but the Senate amended by striking out the House provision. The House passed the following:

The rank and title of major general is hereby created in the Marine Corps, and the President is authorized to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one major general, who shall at all times be junior in rank to the major general commandant, and also one temporary major general in the Marine Corps, who shall at all times be junior to the permanent major general.

The House passed that. The Senate struck that out and inserted a clause including the commandant for lieutenant general and reinserting the language passed by the House.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I see where the parliamentary situation is. We then have three major generals in the Marine Corps to-day, and not one of them with troops in the field, but every one of them in a post here in Washington.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Not now. The gentleman may refute that later on, if he can.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to say that there is not a single major general except the commandant.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There is not a major general of marines in the field?

Mr. PADGETT. There is no major general of marines except Gen. Barnett. The others are brigadier generals.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; and it is proposed that these three major generals, to be created by this bill, shall remain here in Washington and not one go with troops to France. There may be but one now, but when this bill is passed there will be three.

Mr. PADGETT. No; that is not intended, either.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then everything I have heard about the subject coming from the Committee on Naval Affairs is wrong.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman will permit, there are two amendments. This first amendment deals with the question of making the commandant a lieutenant general. I take it the gentleman proposes later to offer another amendment along the same lines, creating three major generals of these staff officers down at the War Department. Is not that true?

Mr. PADGETT. During the continuance of the war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am very glad to have this colloquy straighten out and clarify the atmosphere. It simply discloses how much, or rather how little, we really know of what we are asked here to do at this time, and how much the atmosphere is befogged, and how careful we ought to be before we move. This, to my mind, is the most sinister thing that has crept into the halls of Congress since the declaration of war against the mighty Empire of Germany more than a year ago. Are we to begin to establish the precedent of elevating to high rank here in Washington staff officers who have performed no important service in this great struggle, while we have no reward at hand to give to the men on the battle fields, in the danger and in the strife, who are adding glory to the flag and new luster to its stars?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Are there any lieutenant generals in the Army?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There are none. Now let me reafirm. There has never been a lieutenant general of our Army in the history of our Government in a time of war except just once, and that was when Gen. Grant was raised from a major general to a lieutenant general in March, 1864, and then he was made commander in chief of all the forces of the Union. He demanded that position before he would take command of the Army of the Potomac. That was a condition precedent to his entering upon the discharge of the duties of commander of the Army of the Potomac. He demanded that he be put in that highest position, so that his word would be law throughout the military world of the Union. That is the only instance in our history. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] asks if we now have a lieutenant general in the Army. No; we have none.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman knows that we have generals of higher rank than lieutenant general in the Army.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. True; and I am glad to come to that. I happen to have some first-hand information on that subject. We would have no general in the Army to-day if it were not for one thing. The men who have fought the battles of this Republic have always been major generals, with the one exception of Gen. Grant, and they would be major generals in this war if it were not for one thing. We are one of many nations fighting a common enemy. There is no need for secrecy. When Gen. Pershing went to France a major general of the Army, he found that his rank was not such as to put him on an equal footing with the higher command of the British and French Armies; and because of that, and only because of that, it was recommended to the President that the rank of the man in command of our expeditionary force should be elevated to the supreme rank of general in order that he might have a rank commensurate with that of the commanders in chief of the armies of our allies, so that when he met them in conference he would meet them on an equal footing. It was for that reason only that Gen. Pershing was given the rank of general.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is aware of the fact that he is not the only general we have in the service?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am very glad the gentleman has said that. He has anticipated my next sentence. Having a general in the field, our staff then presented an anomaly. Our Chief of Staff was a major general. The Chief of Staff must give orders to the men in the field.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have been interrupted so much I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] if he will let me have 10 minutes more? I do not think I will use that much more time.

Mr. PADGETT. I can not give the gentleman 10 minutes, as I have promised the time to others, but I will give the gentleman 5 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to ask a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has yielded five minutes more to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that we do not hasten the conclusion of this matter; the House wants to know what we are doing.

Mr. PADGETT. I think within the hour the House can understand everything about it. I have yielded five minutes more to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, finding it was necessary to have one general in the field in France, the Chief of Staff here, who must issue orders, being only a major general, the consequence was that the Chief of Staff had to be raised to the rank of general. For the reason that we had created the rank of general in France, therefore the Chief of Staff here, Gen. Bliss, was raised to the rank of general.

Now, for reasons we do not need to discuss here to-day, Gen. Bliss ceased to be the head of the General Staff and was sent to France, where he forms a part of the council in Paris. A man was selected as acting Chief of Staff for the reasons that many of us know, and I think all of us, and I am glad to say a splendid man has been selected, none better could be found in our Army, and the same situation was repeated. He as acting Chief of Staff had of necessity to be raised to the rank of general in order that he might issue orders.

Mr. FLOOD. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. Is it not a fact that we have a statute now authorizing the President to appoint lieutenant generals in the Army, just as this law will authorize him to appoint the lieutenant general in the Marine Corps?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have not the time to fully answer that now, but the gentleman is entirely mistaken. There is a statute, as there ought to be, authorizing the President to appoint a lieutenant general in the Army, but he has appointed none and he will not appoint one for the present. When he does appoint a lieutenant general, if he does—and I have great doubt whether we will see one appointed—if he does, he will be commander of a million men; he will be commander of an army.

Mr. FLOOD. Commander of a corps.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is incorrectly advised. From the time our history started corps commanders in this Government have been major generals. The Marine Corps has been expanded to its utmost limits and they will have seventy-five or eighty thousand men, not half of an army corps. It is not one-tenth of an army, and yet it is proposed here to make a man in Washington a lieutenant general in this corps. Why, you make me think of the armies in Central and South America, where they have 1 private and 40 generals. Stop it, my brethren, for God's sake, and think of the men fighting the battles of the Republic in France. I have seen these men under fire and I know what they are thinking of. Let us not betray them here. I have said many a time if we lose this war it will be behind the line and not on the line. These boys on the line in rank and file will deliver the goods, but it is such things as this that betray the fatal weakness. Out with it. Down with it. Hit it a last killing blow, one that will sound across the seas to the boys that are fighting our battles, and it may be our last fight. A message to them that while we ask them to be true there we will be true here, and when the rewards are handed out for service in this war they will go to the men that have earned them, and not to those who may, perchance, be favored by certain beautiful social surroundings in the Capital of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman intend to close the debate within the hour?

Mr. PADGETT. I hope to; we have debated it heretofore.

Mr. BUTLER. I have debated it before. I would like to have 5 or 10 minutes, and I would like to have some other gentlemen have time.

Mr. PADGETT. I have agreed to yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING]. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania 10 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, no living man ever was more greatly embarrassed than I am, because I am conscious of having yielded to what is wrong. For two months nearly have I stood against doing what is proposed here to be done. I am not telling anything that I ought not to tell, but I took this position after talking with the chairman of the committee and talking with the Secretary of the Navy about it. I know it is absolutely wrong to advance this man to this great rank. I will go further and say I talked with my chairman about writing into this bill something that would enable us to have a law—I want the gentlemen of the House to understand that this is not my contest except as I make it as the one individual. I wanted to see legislation that would enable us to go ahead and fight the enemy and not quarrel over it and quarrel over it for weeks, as we have, and as yet we have no bill. It contains a provision which authorizes the enlistment of many thousand marines. I confess to you that I am a poor conferee, and I now make the vow that never again will I serve on a conference committee. I am done, and the Chair need never appoint me to a conference committee on anything. I made an effort to get a law, and in doing that, my friends, I weakened myself. The compromise is not right, and the gentleman from Minnesota is right. But in my anxiety and my zeal to obtain a law by which this Navy could be increased in size, I did sit with the gentleman, and he read to me what he had written, and I said, "If this is the best that we can do, let us do it."

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Does the gentleman mean to tell the House that this bill can not be passed unless this one man receives this promotion?

Mr. BUTLER. Let me answer the question—upon my honor, I believe that to be so.

Mr. KEARNS. Then I think it is time for the House to vote down such a proposition. [Applause.] If this man is more interested in his promotion than he is winning the war, it is time for the House to act.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that statement ought to go into the RECORD.

Mr. GARNER. That is what he said.

Mr. PADGETT. No such condition has been presented.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I can not yield. Give me 20 minutes and I will be glad to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LINTHICUM rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants the Chair to protect him from interruption, the Chair will do it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, the Chair has saved me from trouble before, and if they would give me more time I would be very glad to try to take care of myself, but I do not care to be interrupted. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] asked me a question. The chairman of the committee says that no such situation arose. Upon my honor it does arise when men sit stubbornly and shake their heads, when they compromise as to other things that involve the Coast Guards. No! Never again will I serve on a conference and compromise by doing what I think is not right in order to reach a conclusion. I agree with my chairman, and I shall stand by and endeavor to assist. Further than that, my chairman is fair. It was I who suggested to him that in order to get this bill passed so that it might become a law, so that we could recruit these marines and send them abroad, so that we could pay the expenses of this Navy, that we in part surrender. That is the reason that I feel that on this I have not done perhaps what is right. Now, again, let gentlemen listen to me a bit. I compacted with my chairman that I would vote for this amendment. I know I made a mistake there. I feel myself obliged not to desert my chairman, but if the House decides to turn this down, if the House sees fit to send me back as one of its conferees, then I shall go, and if need be bear the burden alone, and I will sit until Hell becomes a place for saints before I surrender. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has declined to yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. I merely wanted to know whether the gentleman had surrendered the rest of us or not.

Mr. BUTLER. I surrender the whole of the House. The House by 35 majority decided what it did. No, sir; we brought this back, as instructed by the House. This is not in the conference report. It is here for the House to pass upon. Now, let me go back a minute. I can not deal with men who simply shake their heads against a decent argument. I thought it was the business of the conferees, if possible, to obtain an agreement, and while I propose to vote for this resolution, it is against my judgment. Do you want it plainly? That is where it is. You may accuse me of cowardice, if you please, in talking one way and voting another. What is the business of a conferee? Is it not to obtain an agreement? Do we not have to give and take? I know my chairman does not agree with me, but it is my judgment that unless you put this up to the President of the United States we will have no bill. The chairman disagrees with me upon that. He is used to conferences; he is used to the ways of conferees. I am not. I want the game played on top of the table. [Applause and laughter.] Mr. Speaker, it is true that it is provided that the President may appoint a lieutenant general in the Army or more than one. My friend from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] understands; but it is also provided that he shall command an army or a corps, and a corps consists, for I asked the question myself, of 175,000 men. Whether the President of the United States will do this I do not know, and if I had anticipated he would I never would have suggested it, because I have confidence in the President of the United States and in the Secretary of the Navy. I do not think, as some man said to me, that we are passing the buck up to the President of the United States and that the same influence will reach there that has been reaching here. I know nothing of that. I am through. I have attempted, in a weak way, to show my weakness, to show you my efforts, and I do not want any man here who has been sharing the same view with me to say that I have abandoned him. It is only in an effort to get a law that I have done this. I repeat what I said—if the House sees fit to turn this down, there will be no more compromise from me. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, before I close, I find that I have done a colleague of mine a great injustice, my Republican colleague on this conference, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING]. That gentleman did stay with me in the effort to obey the instructions of this House, and I will say for the chairman also that he made no attempt whatever to disobey the instructions. As shown, he has played perfectly fair with the House.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, who did disobey the instructions?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman asks a question. The Senate of the United States did. The Senate of the United States understood when this amendment was offered that the House was opposed to it, but it will not withdraw. There you are.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, this presents in some respects a very peculiar situation. I want to say that when the conferees were in session, the House conferees stated plainly and emphatically to the Senate conferees that there was only one proposition that the conferees would submit to them, and that was that the Senate conferees must yield; that we would not discuss with them any compromise of the matter; that the House had voted upon it, and, as representing the House, it is our plain duty to tell them that the Senate must yield. That is the only question that we discussed on this amendment with the Senate conferees. They stated positively they would not yield. As we returned from the conference, my good friend and coconferee, Mr. BUTLER, went with me into my office and himself suggested this very amendment that I have offered, and asked me if I would not offer it, and stated that if I would he would support it. And we together in my office prepared this amendment, the wording and verbiage of it which he read to me, with the statement that he would make a few remarks in support of it, and that he would come upon the floor and talk with the Members and urge the acceptance of this amendment. I think, with this statement of the facts, it explains my position in this matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for just one question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, think again. The gentleman asked me to offer this, and then said, "I will do it"——

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman said he would do it, and then asked me to offer it later.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman said he would do it, and neither of us wanted it. [Laughter and applause.] Are not we both ashamed of such childish play, to be perfectly candid, I ask of my chairman?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. PADGETT. This with me is not childish play. The gentleman did offer to make the motion himself and later he suggested that I make the motion, and I told him I would, and I have; and I have made it in good faith——

Mr. BUTLER. That is true; that is right.

Mr. PADGETT. And as an adjustment of this situation. Now, what is the situation, gentlemen? A great deal of passion and excitement seems to have arisen. Now, let us take the situation calmly, deliberately, patriotically, and wisely. I have no personal interest and feeling in this matter. I want to submit all the facts to the House, and in the future I will carry out the will of the House as I have in the past. When I was asked by others why we did not propose this to the conferees, I stated because I was going to submit it to the House for the House to reach an adjustment and not the conferees.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Not now; let me go ahead; I do not desire to be interrupted. Now, in the Army we have the rank of general and in the Navy we have the corresponding rank of admiral. There are four in the Navy with rank of admiral. There are three in the Army with the rank of general. Some of them in the Army are abroad and one of them is here. In the Navy three of them are abroad or at sea and one is here in the department. Now, next below the rank of general is lieutenant general, and the act of Congress which was pased last fall authorized the President to appoint lieutenant generals by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He has not yet exercised that authority. In the Navy the corresponding rank of lieutenant general is vice admiral. We have three vice admirals in the Navy. Now, the next rank below in the Army is major general. The corresponding rank in the Navy is rear admiral of the upper nine. There is no corresponding rank to that in the Marine Corps. The highest rank in the Marine Corps is in line with brigadier general, and we did not have that until the act of August 29, 1916, when they were given the rank of brigadier general, the highest up to that time being colonel. Now, the major general commandant has a rank of major general pertaining to his office. It is not his rank in the line, because he is a brigadier general. He was a colonel when appointed, because that was the highest rank at that time; but since August, 1916, we have a brigadier general. He has been promoted in the line as a brigadier general, but by virtue of his office when he holds that office he has the rank of major general. We have given in this bill the rank of major general to all of your bureau chiefs in the Navy. In the bill which was passed last October it was given to all bureau chiefs of the Army, and this present session of Congress there was a bill passed with a provision for major general rank for the chiefs of bureaus to put them upon an equality with the Army that was provided at the last session of Congress. Now, my friends, we come to the Marine Corps. I stated to you that the highest rank we had in the line was brigadier general. The House passed a provision, which both Houses have agreed to, that there should be one permanent major general and that there should be during the war a temporary major general. These men were needed because of the increase in the Marine Corps. You bear in mind that in August, 1916, the Marine Corps was less than 10,000. By that act we increased it to 17,400 permanently. We then, in May, 1917, increased it to 30,000 temporarily; and in this bill we have provided for a temporary increase to 75,500.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I can not; let me proceed to make a consecutive statement. Now, the Senate put on an amendment by legislation promoting during the war the major general commandant to lieutenant general. It was temporary, it was legislation; but in the Army it is done by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In the Navy the admirals and vice admirals and the other officers are nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. In the other legislation in this bill in reference to the Coast Guard and other provisions here we have provided that the promotions should be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Not now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think the gentleman ought to yield.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, when the Senate conferees declined to yield, and under the circumstances which I detailed to you, I have offered this amendment to promote the commandant of the Marine Corps upon exactly the same basis and under the same provision and the same procedure as is followed in the case of the Army and the Navy and all the other officers of the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps. Now, that is the whole fact. It leaves it to the President, and yet they come here now and say we are passing the buck.

Why do they say that we are "passing the buck," when we do not by legislation promote or create a single major general or general or lieutenant general in the Army, or a single admiral or vice admiral or rear admiral in the Navy, or a brigadier general in the Marine Corps?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I will yield you five minutes later on.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to run over my time. I want to stop within 15 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. The chairman and I have been telling the House here of our conversations back and forth quite freely, and it will do us good to make our confessions. Did not the chairman tell me he was unalterably opposed to this?

Mr. PADGETT. Not unalterably opposed. I said I was opposed to it, and I so stated in the House. I did not use the word "unalterably."

Mr. BUTLER. Did not he tell Mr. BRITTEN——

Mr. PADGETT. I told the House when the matter was up before that I saw no military necessity. But as we leave it to the President, there may be a military justice in it as distinguished from a military necessity. They will fight just as well.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; they will fight just as well. I am a great believer in the corporal and sergeant. They do good fighting. Now, we will not argue here any favor in those promotions. It is only, as I understand, in favor of the amendment turning it over to the President. I do not understand the chairman is advocating this promotion.

Mr. PADGETT. I am leaving it with the President, and I put in here such guarded language as has never been put in before. I want to read it:

That the President be, and he is hereby, in his discretion, if he deems it for the good of the service.

Now, then, my friends, if it is for the good of the service under the judgment and opinion of the President of the United States, who is responsible for the conduct of this war, can not we intrust him with the duty and the responsibility of saying whether or not this man shall have this rank? I do not think it is fair, either to the House or to the custom of legislation or to the President, to say that we are "passing the buck" to him when we are pursuing the identical course in this that has always been pursued, to give the President the power and authority to make these promotions by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves two minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I promised to yield to the gentleman from Wyoming, if he wants the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Tennessee promised me 8 minutes. Can he not make it 10?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. MONDELL. I know, Mr. Speaker, that we are anxious to vote, but this is a rather important matter and will, I think, stand a little more discussion. On all the seven seas the American Navy is fighting to make the world safe for democracy, and a branch of the Congress is holding up a bill carrying $1,600,000,000 necessary for the maintenance of that great arm of a free people unless the people's Representatives agree to give rank and titles, that heretofore we have reserved for fighting men, to men who never planned a campaign, never directed or led a hostile movement, and never smelt the smoke of battle. That is the proposition. Are we going to do it?

We are told that the Navy of the Republic, now making the greatest record of all its glorious history, is going to be denied its appropriations unless the Congress makes major generals of the leaders of Washington's cotillions. [Applause.] I have no criticism of staff officers who do their duty. I realize the importance of the duty of sending men here and there when ordered to do it. I realize the importance of sending muskets and blankets and supplies to the marines here, there, and elsewhere. It is a useful and an honorable employment. But it is not an employment which makes a man worthy of the honors which the Republic has always held jealously to be conferred only on the men who showed themselves masters of the art of war and skillful leaders of armies. [Applause.] What is proposed in this and the following amendment is that we shall have one lieutenant general and five major generals in a corps of 75,000 men, and only one of whom is likely, under any circumstances, to ever reach the firing line or have to do with the planning or development of campaigns, great or small. Why, on that basis we should have at least 12 lieutenant generals in the line of the Army to-day and 24 within the year, and as many more in the staff. On a similar basis we would have 150 major generals for the Army that we now have and 300 a year hence.

If there were no other argument against this preposterous proposal than the personal effort in their own behalf and the use of social influence by the men who are seeking promotions, that in itself ought to condemn the proposition in toto. The men who should be rewarded are the men who have proved their worth in the field and in real war service, and not those who seek through personal and social influence to obtain the highest rewards of the Republic. We know that the men who would be the recipients of these favors, to which they are not entitled, have themselves and through their personal friends been using every influence and pulling every string in order to secure these promotions.

Over yonder on the firing line are the boys that are maintaining the honor of the flag, many of them in the Marine Corps. Among them are those who some day the Republic will be delighted to honor by making them lieutenant generals. Let us reserve those honors for those fighting men. [Applause.] Let us not give them to the swivel-chair warriors who are lingering here safely behind the lines. Gentlemen may not think this is important, but it is tremendously so; for here it is that we establish the fact whether we stand by our guns and prove this is a war for democracy and not one to reward favorites and build up a nonfighting military aristocracy. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming yields back two minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a moment, and then I shall move the previous question.

Gentlemen have made the statement here that this bill can not pass without the House agreeing to this amendment. I speak it respectfully, but that is the merest nonsense and poppycock. There is no such position presented. The new year does not begin and the operation of this bill does not begin until the next fiscal year.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. PADGETT. I can not yield.

Mr. MEEKER. Just for one question.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Can the gentleman explain why it is that all opposition, except from one, is from gentlemen who voted against the war and against preparedness?

Mr. PADGETT. I am not questioning the motives of any man. I am conceding to everyone the same honesty and sincerity of purpose that I claim for myself. [Applause.]

Now, dismiss that. Let this matter be settled upon its merits. If you are opposed to it upon its merits, vote against it. If you are in favor of it, support it. The bill will be passed, whatever action may be taken by the House. I want to make that statement plain and clear. [Applause.]

Now, some criticism has been made of Gen. Barnett. I have refrained from taking any part in this matter on the personal side. I have dealt with it from the service side. But I do want to say that the Marine Corps is, in my judgment, the best trained and the best organized and the best fighting force under the shining sun. [Applause.] I do not care who they are or whose people they are; and these men have been under the control and under the management and under the training of Gen. Barnett. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, if you are for it, support it on its merits. If you are against it, vote against it upon principle and upon its merits. But in God's name and in the name of the men who are under him, who praise him, who love him, and who would follow him into the very jaws of death, for God's sake and country's sake, do not asperse his character. [Applause.] Do not impugn the integrity and the patriotism of a man who is as brave and as chivalrous as any man who was ever in the military service of the United States. [Applause.]

Now, my friends, the Marine Corps has reached a stage where I believe it has merited and should receive recognition. Let us remember that this increased rank is not alone for Gen. Barnett. It is recognition for the corps, and I believe sincerely that when I mention "Marine Corps" it causes a heartbeat of patriotism and admiration in every man who is interested in the success of this war and in the preservation of the democracy for the world to be made fit to live in. And also, my friends, you are interested in fair play as well as democracy. Let us be fair and let us be just. Do not let us cast aspersions upon and belittle the men who with all of the zeal and the earnestness of sincere, honest officers have contributed every particle of effort, energy, integrity, and intelligence that they possess to the success of the training and the development of these men. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to recede from the House disagreemnt to Senate amendment 37 and to concur in the same with an amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. PADGETT) there were—ayes 69, noes 111.

Accordingly the motion of Mr. PADGETT was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the——

Mr. PADGETT. There is no necessity of making any motion. The vote just taken is equivalent to a disagreement.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the House conferees adhere to the wishes of this House.

Mr. PADGETT. I hope the gentleman will not offer a motion of that kind. The House conferees know the will of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. Out of respect for my chairman, I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] stated that the vote just taken was equivalent to a vote of disagreement. That vote was on a motion to recede and concur with an amendment. I do not think that is equivalent to a motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Wisconsin. If it had been a flat motion to concur, then it would have been.

Mr. PADGETT. I move that the House still further insist upon its disagreement to amendment numbered 37.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House still further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment 37.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL), there were—ayes 171, noes 0.

The SPEAKER. Not a soul rises in the negative, and the motion is carried by a vote of 171 ayes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House still further insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendment 47.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment 47: Page 38, lines 17 and 18, insert the following: "And the heads of existing staff corps of the Marine Corps."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment 47.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate amendment No. 52.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment 52: Page, 41, beginning with line 11 and ending with line 15, on page 42, insert the following:

That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, is hereby amended as follows:

Strike out the whole of the fifth paragraph under the subcaption, "Pay, Marine Corps," and substitute the following:

"That prior to January 1, 1920, any officer holding a permanent appointment in any staff department may, upon his own application, with the approval of the President, be reappointed in the line of the Marine Corps in the grade and with the rank he would hold on the date of his reappointment if he had remained continuously in the line: Provided, That such officers as shall be so reappointed shall take rank and precedence next after those officers of the line of the Marine Corps in the grades so augmented at the time of the passage of this act, and they shall thereafter be carried as additional numbers to the numbers of the grade to which they may be appointed or to which they may at any time be promoted, and each such officer shall thereafter be promoted contemporaneously and to take rank next after the officer immediately above him: Provided further, That such staff officer shall, before being reappointed in the line of the Marine Corps as above provided, perform line duties for one year, at the expiration of which time he shall as a prerequisite to reappointment in the line be required to establish to the satisfaction of an examining board consisting of line officers of the Marine Corps his physical, mental, and professional fitness for the performance of line duty."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PADGETT moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52 and concur in the same with an amendment as follows: Page 16, line 9 of the Senate engrossed amendment, after the word "President," insert the following: "If the President deems it for the good of the service."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not press this.

Mr. PADGETT. I think there is merit in this proposition, and the gentleman agreed with me about it.

Mr. BUTLER. The House voted down the other, and I hope the House will vote this down.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman agreed with me on this amendment yesterday, and I put it in the very language that he asked me to.

Mr. BUTLER. I know; but I did on the other, too, and the House voted it down.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the House for a moment, I want to make an explanation of what this is. We have in the Marine Corps the line and we have also the staff. The line are the fighting men and the staff corps are the men who do the supplying and the furnishing of equipment, and so forth. They were two separate organizations. In the act of August 29, 1916, the House passed a provision amalgamating the staff into the line, to become effective as the men retire and get out of service, so that ultimately we will have only the line, and the duties that are now performed by staff officers permanently will be performed by line officers detailed for limited terms, a year or two years or three years or four years, as they may be detailed, and not staff officers for life. It incorporates and amalgamates the staff into the line and becomes effective when the men who were in the staff pass out.

Another part of that legislation provided that the staff officers up to and including the majors might, by examination and qualification, go into the line and take the place in the line that they would have had if they had remained in the line from the beginning; in other words, come in not as extra numbers, but might come in ahead of some others. There was opposition to officers above the grade and rank of major coming in, and an adjustment was made in 1916, in the act then passed, allowing the officers of the rank of major and below, by examination and qualification, to come out of the Staff Corps into the line in the regular place in which they would be, but not as extra numbers. It was denied to the officers above the rank and grade of major. This amendment simply amends the act of August 29, 1916, by permitting the officers above the grade and rank of major upon examination and qualification, upon the approval of the President, to stand an examination, and after one year's trial come into the line and pass out of the staff. That is all that it does. But they come in this time as extra numbers, so as not to go in above somebody and displace him. There are only eight such officers. We are needing officers. Now, the suggestion has been made that staff officers do not do any fighting, that they sit around here in swivel chairs, that they do not go into the fighting lines and the trenches. Under the organization as it is now they can not. But here is the proposition, you permit them to go into the fighting line and permit them to go to the trenches and to exercise the fighting privileges. Strange to say, the very class who are fighting most vigorously and criticizing the staff officers because they did not fight are now opposing this proposition to allow them to fight.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Will the adoption of the gentleman's amendment enable a man who has gained his promotion while serving in a staff position to displace a man who won his promotion in active duty on the field of battle?

Mr. PADGETT. It does not, because he goes in as an extra number. He would go in as a corresponding number in the line, and he would take his place in the fighting line corresponding to what he had in the staff. He does not displace anybody, because he comes in as an extra number.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. This is true, that when he comes into the line he takes the same place in the line that he would have occupied if he had remained in the line all the time. So the gentleman's answer to the question of the gentleman from Colorado should be "yes."

Mr. PADGETT. No; it should be "no." Suppose you have a colonel in the line and this man came in as No. 1, 2, 3, or 4, or whatever the number might be, he would not displace a single one, because he comes in as No. 4 and he would be the second to go alongside of the regular No. 4. He does not displace No. 4. If he came in as No. 10 he would be a second to No. 10 alongside of him. He would not displace anybody in the line; he would not displace No. 11 or No. 9.

Mr. MONDELL. But he takes the same position that he would have occupied had he remained in the line all the time.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does it not prevent the promotion of another man in the line?

Mr. PADGETT. No; it does not. If he is No. 6, you promote the two number sixes. If he is No. 5, you promote both number fives. He is an extra number and goes up with the man that is his running mate.

Mr. MONDELL. But suppose there is only one vacancy?

Mr. PADGETT. Then that would be filled by promoting the man that is his running mate in the line. If he is No. 6 the only one that is promoted is his running mate, and under the law he would go next after his running mate.

Mr. MONDELL. In that case he would displace the next man.

Mr. PADGETT. No; he would not.

Mr. FIELDS. The regular man would displace him.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, to my way of looking, this is the most obnoxious thing that could happen, far more obnoxious than the making of a lieutenant general or promoting major generals on the staff. This amendment is written for one man.

Mr. FLOOD. Name him.

Mr. BUTLER. If you take eight officers out of the staff, have you not got to take eight officers out of the line to put in their places? This is intended for one man, and if there is an investigation I will name him.

Mr. MONDELL. Can not the gentleman name him now?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I can name him; I know him. I will name him at the proper time.

Mr. MONDELL. A man important enough to have a Senate amendment is important enough to be named.

Mr. BUTLER. The chairman of the committee says that this authorizes men to be put back among the fighting men and command them. It does. Men who have been here 18, 20, and 25 years and who have reached a certain grade. Now, in this bill colonels and brigadier generals are authorized to go back in the line after they have lived in town 15 or 25 years. It is unfair, and, furthermore, the Secretary of the Navy protests against it. He protests that these men who have been away from the fighting men for years ought not to be now placed in command of them.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask a question for information. Of course, in the Marine Corps, the line is now officered from the top to the bottom.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would it be possible under this amendment to transfer or take a man that has retired from the staff, give him a commission in the line, promote him and then transfer him back to the staff, and in that way prevent the promotion of a marine officer in the line?

Mr. BUTLER. By taking the men off the staff and putting them in the line in high places. There are men who are in command having the rank of lieutenant colonel and major who, going back to the line, will be a colonel. Why? Because the act authorizes them to be put in the line where they would have been if they had remained in the line.

Mr. McKENZIE. If a man had been on the staff for 15 years he could be put back into the line, given promotion and a commission, and displace a man who had been in the line all the time for promotion.

Mr. BUTLER. He can displace him.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania stand for that?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not. Wait a bit. This is one of the measures. I will be perfectly candid. I hoped that the chairman would not press this on the House. I hoped he would treat this as he did amendment No. 47. I did agree with him that this amendment might be offered, but the great majority that this House cast against the proposition in the matter of the promotion of Gen. Barnett convinces me of the feeling of the House, and now I ask him not to press it. I stand here for the line. I stand for the men who yet will be received at the hands of Providence. Ah, my old friend, these men will not be with us always. Why? You take from these men the right to command their own men by giving them strangers? Never! Are you going to place colonels in the line to command these men in the trenches in France? Never! That is not intended perhaps. There are convenient places where these men can suddenly be promoted from majors and lieutenant-colonels to colonels and perhaps brigadiers. No; do not do it. I ask the chairman not to press this, but let it go back to conference along with the others. I thought the chairman and I understood it. I thought his views upon this amendment were the same as mine.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. Let this go back.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman came to me yesterday——

Mr. BUTLER. I know I did.

Mr. PADGETT. And asked me to agree to this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. And I put in the very language that he agreed to, and he asked me to make this motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I did so.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman will remember that in the conference——

Mr. BUTLER. I will admit it.

Mr. PADGETT. I told him this was good legislation.
Mr. BUTLER. I admit it.
Mr. PADGETT. But I would not press it in conference out of regard for him.
Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman would win his case by assailing me. All right; do it. Why do you not take the part of the fighting men? Why do you not speak for them? Every line man in this corps, and I know 400 of them, is opposed to this. I will give you a bit of history.
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes.
Mr. MADDEN. If there are any promotions to be made, ought they not to be made from the men in the fighting line?
Mr. BUTLER. That is what I am arguing for.
Mr. MADDEN. And this would interfere with that?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes.
Mr. MADDEN. Then it ought not to be done.
Mr. BUTLER. It will interfere with it in this way: That men now lieutenant colonels and majors will become colonels, and there are only so many to be appointed colonels. Keep them out. I will give you a bit of history before I close. This has always been a point of contention between the line and the staff. The staff has sat here in this town and has endeavored to impose on the line, because it has been far, far away, thousands of miles on the other side of the sea; and permit me to say that I have been one man that has stood for the line and against this terrible influence surrounding us all of the time to pinch these poor fellows. Listen. One year and a half ago we wrote in the law a personnel bill. It was then that the staff asked for this very thing. I stood against it, and I had the names of 170 line officers away from home who asked me not to have this done. They said, "Do not allow these men to come in here and crowd us; we do not want them to command us."
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes.
Mr. MADDEN. There ought not to be any need for a line man to ask any Member of Congress to protect his rights. His rights ought to be sacred, and it is our duty to stand by the men who do the fighting and not permit any other man, no matter who he is or where he comes from, to get in the way of the other fellow's promotion.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BUTLER. Let me reply to my friend, so that I may be absolutely well warned and well told. I asked to have these men sounded. It was done at my request. They protested against it. It was then agreed between the line and the staff that this thing would not be done, and harmony was secured. The staff agreed with me, standing over in that committee room, that if they were made brigadier generals they would not ask to go back in the line, and, therefore, we wrote that into the bill.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is the gentleman's opinion that this amendment will take away from men in the line the promotion that would come to them if the amendment were defeated?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes; in this way: Say there are 20 colonels. If you are going into this staff and pick out majors and lieutenant colonels, they will then drift into these places and, of course, it will interfere with promotion.
Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes.
Mr. KEARNS. I understood the gentleman to say a while ago that the Secretary of the Navy, and presumably the President, were opposed to this amendment.
Mr. BUTLER. Yes.
Mr. KEARNS. That is true, is it?
Mr. BUTLER. Let me reply to my friend. I have this statement.
Mr. KEARNS. Is that true?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes. That is, the Secretary of the Navy is opposed to it.
Mr. KEARNS. And presumably the President?
Mr. BUTLER. I should think so. I do not know anything about it, and I must not commit the President.
Mr. KEARNS. In discussing this amendment a few days ago the gentleman made a statement that there was a most insidious and powerful lobby being maintained here in Congress for the insertion of these two amendments. Does the gentleman not think this proves it, because it is the only time that Congress has ever attempted since I have been a Member of it to do something over the head of the Secretary of the Navy and the President?
Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, let me reply upon the question of discipline. I have never gone against the Commander in Chief, the Secretary of the Navy, and I will not do it. I went down and consulted him about this, and he came out and made a statement, and in that he says that he protests, and he gives his reasons for it—that these men ought not to be in command of these fighting men because of their long, long absence from the fighting ranks.
Mr. KEARNS. But there is an attempt on the part of the House now to do that same thing that the Secretary of the Navy said he did not want.
Mr. BUTLER. I agree with my chairman that I did—in a weak moment I did. The House has repudiated one, and I ask that this be sent back to conference.
Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BUTLER. Yes.
Mr. MONDELL. These men who would be injuriously affected by this legislation are on the fighting line?
Mr. BUTLER. They are.
Mr. MONDELL. The men who would be benefited are right here?
Mr. BUTLER. They are; every one of them.
The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. BUTLER. I ask that this be sent back to conference.
Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a few moments. I want again to state and disabuse the mind of anyone who considers that this interferes in the least with the fighting men. It does not. As I stated before, there are only eight. There is no great horde of men going in. I want to explain again that in August, 1916, when we had the other legislation, there was a proposal to put them in ahead of the men in the line. This is to put them in as extra numbers alongside of the men in the line, so that they do not in any way interfere with the men in the line.
Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield? What will be the good of that? Where will the good come to the service? I know where the good would come to those men, but where will it come to the service?
Mr. PADGETT. I can tell where it comes. You convert men who are now in the staff into the line, where they can fight. Now, I want to call attention to another thing. The gentleman said something about they come in now and get it. It takes a year for them to come in. They can not be appointed in the line until they have served one year. Let me read:

Provided further, That such staff officer shall, before being reappointed in the line of the Marine Corps as above provided, perform line duties for one year, at the expiration of which time he shall as a prerequisite to reappointment in the line be required to establish to the satisfaction of an examining board consisting of line officers of the Marine Corps his physical, mental, and professional fitness for the performance of line duty.

So he must for one year perform line duties and then be examined by a board composed wholly of line officers, and must demonstrate his fitness and qualifications after one year's trial, and then he would come in the line as a fighting man. Now, he is carrying out the plan which was adopted to amalgamate the staff into the line and get rid of a staff corps that is called "swivel chairs" and to have line officers only, and to detail line officers to perform these staff duties at short intervals or short details, and not have lifelong staff officers outside the fighting line.
Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. PADGETT. In a minute. In 1916 there was objection because then the proposal was to bring them back into the line and distribute them in the line where they would have been if they had remained in the line. That would be before a man or above a man or distributed in the line, but this proposal is different. It does not propose to put them in the line with the others, but put them in as extra numbers, as I explained a moment ago. If a man goes back as No. 6, he is by the side of No. 6 in the regular line. If he goes back as No. 5, he is opposite No. 5. When No. 5 is promoted, he goes up with No. 5, and moves up alongside and does not interfere with anybody. The others below move right up behind No. 5 just as they would if there were no extra numbers. Now, if there is only one promotion, the extra number is behind the regular number.
Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. PADGETT. I will.
Mr. MONDELL. Does not that retard promotion of the next line officer, necessarily?
Mr. PADGETT. No.
Mr. MONDELL. Why?
Mr. PADGETT. Because when he comes up his running mate has been promoted and he is put alongside and the next number moves right up and is alongside of him. Now, I want to call attention to another thing. Conditions have changed from what they were before the war. Now we are in the war. These men want to perform line duty; they want to go into the fighting force, and this is simply a provision allowing the President, if he deems it for the good of the service, to give these men opportunities to demonstrate their fitness, their ability, and their qualification to fight in the line, and after one year's trial, training, and practice, after an examining board of line officers have said they were qualified, to put them in the line, not to interfere with anybody else.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BUTLER. I would like the gentleman to yield me long enough time to read the argument of the Secretary of the Navy in opposing this very amendment.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Tennessee say?

Mr. PADGETT. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BUTLER. Give me three minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. I will yield the gentleman three minutes. I do not want to keep anything back.

Mr. HARDY. Before the gentleman reads, will he allow me to ask the chairman a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I desire to obtain some information.

Mr. PADGETT. I will be glad to give it if I can.

Mr. HARDY. Is it absolutely necessary that good Army men shall some of them be stationed here to perform the duties that these staff officers are performing?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly it is.

Mr. HARDY. What right have you to take a good man and place him here and deny all opportunity of preferment?

Mr. PADGETT. That is a question that the gentleman can answer as well as I can.

Mr. HARDY. What I want to know is, is it not just as important to have good military men here during this time of war, like Gen. Barnett, directing the energies of the forces of the Government here, as it is to have them on the line?

Mr. PADGETT. Of course it is. How could you maintain an army unless you had the force at home to send them the guns and the powder and the bullets and the clothing and all the equipment that is necessary to maintain life and to supply the fighting man?

Mr. HARDY. Do you not need just as good men here now as you do there?

Mr. PADGETT. Of course. But gentlemen have been making criticism here in the House of swivel-chair officers, and here are the men coming and asking for an opportunity to go into the fighting line and not to interfere with anybody else as to extra numbers, and the fight is made against it by the very men that criticize them.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me five minutes?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentlemen of the House will understand that when they asked to come back, they did not ask to come back at the grade they held in the staff, but at grades they would be entitled to have if they stayed in the line. It is for the purpose of getting promotion. These men can all fight if they want to do so. The grand old officer, George Elliott, when commandant of this corps, went down and commanded his men in the field at the time of the insurrection at Panama. These men could all go if they wanted to go. So do not let it be said that they can not go to war. But they have asked to come back into the line for the purpose of advancement and promotion. It is not fair to these men. Let me read what the Secretary of the Navy says about it. The question was asked of him by Mr. PADGETT:

I will ask you, Mr. Secretary, what have you to say about amendment No. 52?

The chairman of the committee, Mr. PADGETT, then read to him the act of Congress of August 29, 1916. And he said:

This is a provision removing that restriction and allowing men above the rank of major to qualify—

Above the rank of major. These fellows have never commanded men, many of them. And what did Secretary Daniels say? He said:

I did not recommend this legislation, and I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. I will be glad if you will insert in the hearing a full statement of the reasons for your action in this matter.

Secretary DANIELS. Very well.

Now, here is the reason:

Ordinarily a staff officer of the Marine Corps lacks the practical training and experience necessary to direct or conduct military operations in the broad sense. He is as a rule essentially a paymaster or a quartermaster and particularly so after long service in his staff pursuits. Under the act of August 29, 1916, staff officers of and below the rank of major were made eligible for transfer to the line under certain conditions, but it is my opinion that to extend the privilege to officers of greater rank would be a step too far. They are of greater value to the Marine Corps and the country in their present callings. The highest officers of the line should be men of long training in the art of war. I think this is brought home to us more forcefully each day of the present war.

And that is what I followed—the instructions of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. Just one word, and I will move the previous question.

I follow the Secretary and try to cooperate with him whenever his reasons appeal to my judgment. I do not always follow him just because it is the judgment of the Secretary. I reserve the right to think for myself. The Secretary gave as his reason why these men should not be transferred that they would not have the qualifications. But this legislation provides:

Provided further, That such staff officer shall, before being reappointed in the line of the Marine Corps as above provided, perform line duties for one year, at the expiration of which time he shall, as a prerequisite to reappointment in the line, be required to establish to the satisfaction of an examining board consisting of line officers of the Marine Corps his physical, mental, and professional fitness for the performance of line duty."

Now, then, if he is qualified to fight in the line, why should he not have the opportunity to do so?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Was the Secretary of the Navy speaking with reference to this amendment in its present form and condemning it?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This amendment makes provision that he shall serve one year in the line before he is entitled to promotion.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the amendment he condemns.

Mr. PADGETT. He gave a reason for his opposition that is met in the amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Has this amendment been written in since?

Mr. PADGETT. No. I asked him to give his reasons, and the reason he gave is met specifically in the terms of the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Just one question and I am through. I want the House to listen. Will these staff corps officers be willing to go back into the line at the grades they held in the staff corps?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know.

Mr. BUTLER. They will not. I will answer for you.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on his motion to recede from the House disagreement to Senate amendment 52, and concur with an amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 52.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 52.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. GOOD. I desire to get a little time from the gentleman on this amendment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PADGETT. Amendment No. 170 has not come up yet.

Mr. GOOD. I understood it was amendment No. 170 that was to come up now.

The SPEAKER. This is on amendment No. 52, that the House do further insist on its disagreement to that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 170: Page 100, line 5, strike out the following: "nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House still further insist on its disagreement to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House still further insist on its disagreement to that amendment.

Mr. GOOD rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire time?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. How much does the gentleman want?

Mr. GOOD. Five minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WINGO, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for the day, on account of illness in his family.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think amendment No. 170 perhaps has more significance, so far as carrying this war to a success is concerned, than any other amendment that has come before the House as presented by this bill.

Amendment No. 170 provides that if the Secretary of the Navy desires to use some of this money to pay bonuses for speeding up, if it is necessary to do that to win the war, he can do it. The House has taken the position that he can not do this. The Senate has taken the position that he can pay the bonus.

We have passed four measures containing this proposition. One was the Army bill, one was the fortification bill, and the other was the sundry civil bill. In the sundry civil bill we did not tie the hands of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, but gave this great organization, having $2,000,000,000 at its command, the right to pay bonuses if necessary. In the fortification bill, appropriating over $5,400,000,000, the Secretary of War can use any part of that for the payment of bonuses or cash rewards, if it is necessary to speed up in order to win the war.

Now, think of the position that this House has taken. Without a dissenting vote you appropriated over $5,400,000,000 for war purposes, and any part of it can be used for the payment of bonuses. But when it comes to the Navy you say, "We do not want to speed up." You say to the Secretary of War, "Pay bonuses to labor if it is necessary to win the war." But you say to the Secretary of the Navy, "If it is necessary in order to win the war to pay bonuses, then let the war be a failure. We will not speed up." That position can not be defended here or anywhere else, but that is the attitude of this House. Now, I do not agree with the editorial that appears in the Washington Post of June 21, headed, "An effective threat." I read:

AN EFFECTIVE THREAT.

Two hundred and five Members of the House of Representatives bowed their heads in submission to the threat of two mechanics employed in navy yards and voted against a Senate provision in the naval appropriation bill permitting the payment of bonuses and premiums. The provision was inserted as the means which might be employed by the Secretary of the Navy in stimulating work and speeding up war activities. It was rejected by the House after two threatening telegrams were read into the RECORD by Chairman PADGETT, of the Naval Committee, to whom they were addressed. Both purport to come from officers or members of a labor union at Portsmouth, Va.

So 205 Members of the House voted against the Senate provision, thereby robbing the Secretary of the Navy of the only possible means within his power of speeding up work on the destroyers and battleships and other Navy craft so urgently needed to win the war. It is pleasant to record that 87 Members stood up undaunted before the threat and supported the proposition.

Why should not the employees of the navy yards be paid bonuses and premiums to stimulate them to their best efforts? Why should they not put forward their highest exertions for the winning of the war? What excuse can there be for them working a normal day at normal production when the whole Nation is straining every nerve and muscle to make extraordinary records, when fellow workmen in private industries in the same line are doing two times, three times, or even four times as much work in the same number of hours?

"Hurry up, hurry up! For God's sake, hurry up!" is the cry uttered by Joseph H. Choate, which rang throughout the Nation and stirred every patriot to greater endeavor. President Wilson, on May 27, standing in the presence of the Congress, said: "The consideration that dominates every other now and makes every other seem trivial and negligible is the winning of the war. * * * There can be no pause or intermission. The great enterprise must, on the contrary, be pushed with greater and greater energy."

In his address to Congress on February 11 the President said: "Our resources are in part mobilized now, and we shall not pause until they are mobilized in their entirety. Our armies are rapidly going to the fighting front and will go more and more rapidly. Our whole strength will be put into this war of emancipation—emancipation from the threat and attempted mastery of selfish groups of autocratic rulers—whatever the difficulties and present partial delays."

On January 4, addressing Congress in joint session, the President uttered these words: "I am sure that I am speaking the mind of all thoughtful Americans when I say that it is our duty as the representatives of the Nation to do everything that it is necessary to do to secure the complete mobilization of the whole resources of America by as rapid and effective means as can be found."

And yet the clarion call to service from the Commander in Chief is stilled by the empty threat of a strike by two employees of the navy yard. The telegrams were intended solely to frighten Congress upon the eve of a general election. Had the bonus provision been retained there would have been no strike, because the great majority of men employed in the navy yards are loyal, patriotic citizens, proud of their country and as eager to help win the war as other Americans. No selfish leader could have seduced them from their important tasks in this crisis. No personal advantage could tempt them from their posts of duty.

The roll call containing the names of the 205 should be framed and hung in the House lobby to commemorate the rout of the House before the gas attack of two walking delegates.

I think that 205 Members voted that way largely because the Secretary of the Navy made some statements before the Committee on Naval Affairs that were not supported by the evidence, and it was on the unsupported statements of the Secretary of the Navy that the House acted.

When this matter was before the House a few days ago it was repeatedly urged that the House should refuse to accept the Senate amendment permitting the Secretary of the Navy to pay bonuses, because the Secretary of the Navy was opposed to the bonus system. The Secretary of the Navy was quoted in this regard. But I want to point out the fact that he stands alone in his contention that labor produces more since the bonus system has been discontinued. I shall place in the RECORD in parallel columns, first, the statement of Secretary Daniels in one column and in the opposite column the statements of Admiral Earle, Chief of Ordnance, and of Admiral Parks, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. It is the business of Admiral Earle, as Chief of Ordnance, and of Admiral Parks, as Chief of Yards and Docks, to keep in close touch with the labor in the navy yards. They are responsible for the quantity production. The Secretary really knows nothing about this situation at first hand, although he speaks with great positiveness. The statements are as follows:

SECRETARY DANIELS.

The workers in Government establishments have done better work than they have ever done. * * * Everything is coming along finely, and they are showing a spirit toward the war that is splendid. You put this thing in (payment of bonuses) and immediately they say you are going to put the Taylor system back, and it is going to reopen an old controversy that will not do us any good.

ADMIRAL EARLE.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that labor at $2 produced as much labor result as $4.40 now produces; that is, 8 hours' labor at $2 a day then produced as much product or result as a 10-hour day now produces at $4.40 a day?

Admiral EARLE. Yes.

Admiral PARKS. In many cases it produced more than the 10-hour day now produces. The efficiency is low.

The CHAIRMAN. That is certainly a sad comment.

Admiral PARKS. It is a terrible business, Mr. Chairman. It is the most serious thing in the war or anything else.

The CHAIRMAN. On the question of labor, how does the product as the result of the 10 hours of labor, which costs you $4.40, compare with the 8 hours of labor, for which you paid $1.60 before the war?

ADMIRAL PARKS.

Admiral PARKS. All the information I have indicates that less useful work is secured for the $4.40 than was formerly secured for $1.60, and some have placed it as low as 65 per cent.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, we have already written into the fortifications bill a provision giving the Secretary of War the power to speed up. Of all places, we should speed up in the Navy. I understand that in one instance ships taking our boys across the sea were convoyed by seven armed ships, and only one of them belonged to the United States. Four of them were English vessels and two were French vessels. If this is true, it certainly appears that we should speed up. And yet we stand here and say that the Secretary of the Navy shall not speed up in the production of these vessels.

Why, in Great Britain the labor unions have entered into an agreement by which the trade-unions waive all their demands, rules, and so forth, during the war. They have agreed to bring in unskilled labor in competition with skilled labor, female labor in competition with male labor, in all cases where it was thought necessary to win the war.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman does not want that statement to go into the RECORD, that the British labor unions had dissolved their unions?

Mr. GOOD. They have agreed to a program that amounts to a dissolution during the war, and I will put in the RECORD an analysis of said agreement.

Mr. KEATING. I do not think the gentleman wants to put in the RECORD the statement that the American Navy is not capable of convoying our boys.

Mr. GOOD. I am stating merely what I am informed is the fact.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. GOOD. To show that the trade-unions of Great Britain have waived practically all their rules and regulations, so far as labor employed in the production of war material is concerned, I quote the following from page 995 of Senate document 114, entitled "British Industrial Experience During the War."

After the conclusion of Mr. Lloyd-George's speech a committee of seven representatives of labor were appointed to draft a plan along the lines suggested by him and to report back to the conference. This committee made a formal report in the form of an agreement which was assented to by all the representatives of the labor organizations present with the exception of the Society of Amalgamated Engineers.

The parties contemplated as of the agreement were (a) the Government, (b) all trade-unions which might subsequently subscribe to the agreement, and (c) employers in whose establishments the trade-unions sanctioned the agreement. The arrangement was to be effective for the duration of the war. Its terms, briefly analyzed, were as follows:

I. PREVENTION OF STRIKES.

A. During the war period there shall in no case be any stoppage of work upon munitions and equipments of war or other work required for a satisfactory completion of the war.

B. To prevent friction and keep differences from arising, all changes of working conditions shall be preceded by notice to the men and an opportunity for conference.

C. Differences as to wages or conditions of employment arising out of the war shall be settled—

1. If possible, by conference between the parties.

2. Failing that, by mutual agreement on one of the three following agencies:

(a) The committee on production.

(b) A single arbitrator, either agreed upon by the parties or, in default of agreement, appointed by the board of trade.

(c) A court of arbitration on which labor and capital are equally represented.

3. Failing all those means, by the board of trade.

D. Questions not arising out of the war should not be made the cause of stoppage during the war period.

II. REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON OUTPUT.

A. In general, all trade-unions shall submit to changes necessary for accelerating the output of war munitions or equipment.

B. In particular, they shall permit—

1. Unrestricted individual production.

2. Dilution of skilled labor by the introduction of female, semiskilled, or unskilled labor.

III. CONCESSIONS TO THE TRADE-UNIONS.

As a reciprocal measure of protection to the workmen the consent of the trade-unions to the removal of restrictions on output shall be made contingent upon the following terms:

A. The giving of undertakings by the employers to the Government that the removal of restrictions on output shall only be for the period of the war, and that prewar conditions will be restored after the war.

B. Keeping of a record of departures from prewar conditions, which record "shall be open for inspection by the authorized representative of the Government."

C. The payment of the customary district rates for the work to female, semiskilled, or unskilled labor used to dilute the labor supply.

D. Priority in postwar readjustments to men now in the employments or to men who have left the employments to join the military or naval forces.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield me time?

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the men who travel the sea all the winter long, through snow and ice, with two suits of clothing, are our children, are American citizens, and they have never lost a pound of anything. I want to say to my friend from Iowa that he must be misinformed. It is true that at times some of the ships in those convoys belong to foreign fleets. It is done, as the Secretary of the Navy has said; and I want now, as a strong party man, here in this place, to express my entire confidence in the ability of Josephus Daniels, the Secretary of the Navy. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. BUTLER. As I told my friend, we can not always have American boats in these fleets because of the absolute necessity to move promptly, but they are always under the command of an American naval officer, and he has not lost a man or a pound of ammunition or a pound of food since last August, and I think he ought to be commended. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. I ask for a vote.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion, that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment of the Senate numbered 170 and agree to the same.

Mr. PADGETT. We have voted that down once on a record vote, by 207 to 86.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman refer to any vote taken to-day?

Mr. PADGETT. No; the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes a preferential motion, that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment of the Senate numbered 170 and concur in the same.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MEEKER) there were—ayes 31, noes 46.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. PADGETT. Will not the gentleman withdraw that?

Mr. MEEKER. I will not withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Withdraw the point.

Mr. MEEKER. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. It can not be done now. It is too late. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. Those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 200, answered "present" 2, not voting 129, as follows:

Mr. WINGO with Mr. WILSON of Illinois.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I have a general pair with him, and so I refrain from voting.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT, Mr. RIORDAN, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. BROWNING.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEVENSON, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for one week, on account of engagements of a political nature.

AURELIO COLLAZO.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate joint resolution 86, authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction in the United States Military Academy at West Point Aurelio Collazo, a citizen of Cuba.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 86.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit Mr. Aurelio Collazo, a citizen of Cuba, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby, and that the said Aurelio Collazo shall agree to comply with all regulations for the police and discipline of the academy, to be studious, and to give his utmost efforts to accomplish the course in the various departments of instruction, and that the said Aurelio Collazo shall not be admitted to the academy until he shall have passed the mental and physical examinations prescribed for candidates from the United States, and that he shall be immediately withdrawn if deficient in studies or conduct and so recommended by the academic board: Provided further, That in the case of the said Aurelio Collazo the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, what is the pressing necessity for the passage of this resolution?

Mr. FLOOD. Unless it is passed by the 1st of July the young man can not get here to begin the first year at the academy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the Cuban Republic at the present time any representative at the Military Academy?

Mr. FLOOD. It has not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

PENSIONS.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 12000, the pension appropriation bill, and I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill and the Senate amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I reserve the right to object if it is to take any time.

Mr. COX. I do not think it will take a minute.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a document from the Secretary of the Interior showing how much this bill will cost.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 15, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the letter of the clerk of your committee to the Commissioner of Pensions, dated the 7th instant, transmitting a copy of Senate bill 3330, to amend the act of May 11, 1912, granting pensions to survivors of the Civil War and the War with Mexico, with request for a report supplemental to that of the 26th ultimo, showing the number of pensioners in each class and the probable cost of the bill if enacted into law, with the age of 72 years substituted for the age of 75 years.

The bill thus amended proposes a rate of $30 per month to persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War, and to such persons reaching the age of 72 years who served six months a rate of $32 per month; one year, $35 per month; one and one-half years, $38 per month; two years or more, $40 per month.

The roll carries no class of survivors rated upon attained age of 72 years. It was ascertained, by running through several thousand roll cards, that about 75 per cent of the survivors pensioned upon the basis of attained age of 70 years were now between the ages of 72 and 75 years. The results of addition of this percentage of the 70-year class on the roll at the close of the last fiscal year to the 75-year class then on the roll by periods of service, and computation of the difference in annual rates at that time and the rates proposed by the bill, are shown in the following tabulation:

Age and length of service	Number	Increased cost per year.
Less than 72 years and served 90 days and over and 72 years and over and served less than 6 months	82,171	$10,670,202
72 years and over and served 6 months and less than 1 year	39,193	5,099,178
72 years and over and served 1 year and less than 1½ years	42,083	6,209,772
72 years and over and served 1½ years and less than 2 years	24,785	4,165,842
72 years and over and served 2 years and over	111,739	15,959,268
Total	299,941	42,104,262

The average annual increase is about $140. Allowance for death losses and other changes may be accepted to reduce the above total to $40,000,000 as representing the approximate cost of the bill for the first year, should it become a law.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary.

On motion of Mr. COX, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate amendment to the pension appropriation bill was agreed to was laid on the table.

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 689) ON THE POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 7237, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment numbered 23 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amendment proposed by the Senate and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, $665,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to extend existing contracts for pneumatic-tube service until March 4, 1919, and the Postmaster General is directed to expend this appropriation for the sole purpose of continuing the existing pneumatic mail tube service, and no part thereof shall be expended for the transportation of mails in any other manner than herein authorized: Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report to Congress not later than the 1st day of December, 1918, (1) whether or not the present pneumatic mail tube service in the cities of New York, N. Y.; Brooklyn, N. Y.; Boston, Mass.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; and St. Louis, Mo., is a valuable and efficient postal facility, whether or not it expedites the delivery of first-class mail, and should be retained or discontinued; (2) to investigate and report whether or not the present pneumatic-tube mail system is suited for the purpose of expediting the delivery of first-class mail, or whether tubes of a different kind or size should be employed; (3) if the said commission should recommend the retention of the present system, should the properties be purchased or leased by the Government and at what price and upon what terms; (4) if said commission should recommend a rental, as at present operated, what compensation should be paid therefor: Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall permit hearings to all parties at interest, and the expense for such investigation shall be paid out of any available funds appropriated for the use of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

And the House agree to the same.

THOS. M. BELL,
HALVOR STEENERSON,
MARTIN B. MADDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. BANKHEAD,
THOS. W. HARDWICK,
CHAS. E. TOWNSEND,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

We do not concur in the above report.

JOHN A. MOON,
A. B. ROUSE,
Of the managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes had it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum, and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion to adjourn was lost.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-seven Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the vote be taken on the motion to adjourn or on concurring in the conference report?

The SPEAKER. The House has just voted down the motion to adjourn.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The original question as proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] was on the motion to concur. The viva voce vote was taken, and the Speaker declared the noes had it. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] moved to adjourn.

Mr. GILLETT. He first made the point of no quorum.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Illinois made the point of no quorum immediately upon the announcement of the vote by the Speaker.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is just submitting one.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] moved to adjourn, which motion was defeated. Then he made the point of no quorum. A subsequent motion intervened, following the declaration by the Speaker that the motion to concur had been defeated. My query is whether the point of no quorum is merely one that there is no quorum present, and therefore that there should be a call of the House, or does it revert back to the original question, which is on concurring or not concurring?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Speaker having gone no further when the question was put than to say that the noes seemed to have it, will it not be in order now to ask for a division?

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair said that the noes had it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the Speaker went only so far as to say the noes seemed to have it.

The SPEAKER. It was such a pronounced vote that the Chair said that the noes had it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania would have demanded a division immediately had not the Chair given recognition to the gentleman from Illinois, who is on the committee and who made the motion to adjourn. The question was clearly subject to a division.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but no gentleman availed himself of the opportunity.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Because the Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois immediately.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois was the only gentleman upon his feet making any motion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not the effect of the position now taken by the Chair to practically deny those who desire a division the right to ask for it?

The SPEAKER. It is simply a question of who will be the quickest on the trigger. The gentleman from Illinois was on his feet and made the motion. The motion was perfectly in order, and there was no reason on earth why the Chair should look about for some one to do something else.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Chair intends to give the House a fair show. I want to ask the Speaker if it is not a fact that ordinarily in stating the result of a vote, after a viva voce vote has been taken, the Chair says the ayes or the noes, as the case may be, seem to have it.

The SPEAKER. Ordinarily the Chair does that, but where the vote one way or the other is overwhelming the Chair simply eliminates that intermediate step.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I respectfully submit that the vote was not so overwhelming that if the chance to divide had been given we could have shown that it was not.

The SPEAKER. No one asked for a division.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Because the Chair did not give the opportunity to the House.

The SPEAKER. In any event, the motion to adjourn would take precedence.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, before the conference report was called up by the chairman of the committee I had made an arrangement with him that when he was recognized he would yield half of his time, one-half hour, to me in favor of the conference report. The situation is this: The chairman of the committee is opposed to the conference report. The majority of these conferees, I think, are entitled to some time, and I did not suppose that the gentleman would immediately yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is not responsible. No one made any effort to indicate that he wanted to make a speech, and the Chair put the question quickly because we want to get away from here.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then I desire to make a motion to reconsider. I think it is a mistake.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the parliamentary situation in reference to this conference committee report it is this, that the Chair put the question whether or not the report should be adopted and the noes had it.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] rose to his feet and made the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Then a division was had, and the noes had that, and the gentleman from Illinois then made the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Now, if the House should adjourn at this point the status of the conference committee report would be that the House had rejected it. That is the parliamentary status. The House having voted in the first instance to reject the report, after that proceeding, then the gentleman from Illinois made a motion to adjourn. That proceeding having gone by, the point of order was made, and it was discovered that there was no quorum present, and if the House should adjourn now the Journal to-morrow would show that the conference committee report had been rejected.

Mr. GILLETT. But a motion to reconsider could be made.

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question the right of the gentleman to make a motion to reconsider——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, allow me to present this thought to the Speaker. I was in the Hall and listening, and the question was put to the House on the adoption of the conference report. A vote was taken viva voce. The Speaker announced that the noes had it. Then some gentleman, I think it was the gentleman from Illinois, made the point of order that no quorum was present. Immediately following that some gentleman, I can not recall who it was, made a motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. FLOOD. It was the same gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. The House then voted on the motion to adjourn and refused to adjourn. Therefore the question recurred as to whether it was a bona fide or legal vote on the adoption of the conference report. In my opinion when the House is dividing by a viva voce vote it is the same as if the House is dividing on a rising vote. When the Chair announced that the noes had it, and the point of no quorum was lodged, if that point was good, it vitiates any legal action of the House.

Mr. FLOOD. He withdrew it. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CRISP. Let me finish this statement. If the Chair determined there was not a quorum here that point would be good and there would be no vote and the automatic call of the House would apply, and the roll would be called on the adoption or rejection of the conference report. That is my understanding of the situation.

Mr. FLOOD. I think the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, my recollection of what transpired was exactly that of the gentleman from Georgia. I asked for the notes of the official reporter and here they are:

> The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.
> The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes had it.
> Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order that no quorum is present, and move that the House do now adjourn.

Then follows——

The SPEAKER. The part that the Chair paid attention to, as far as the gentleman from Illinois was concerned, was the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I did not withdraw the motion of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Afterwards the gentleman made the point again, and the Chair counted and ascertained that there was not a quorum present.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. If there is a vote to be taken on the question of no quorum, will it be on the adoption or rejection of the report of the conferees?

Mr. GARNER. That has been settled.

Mr. MADDEN. It has not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I again appeal to the fairness of the Chair in making this statement.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I maintain, if I may be allowed, that when the question of no quorum was raised that that left the vote on the question of the adoption or rejection of the conference report incomplete.

The SPEAKER. That would have been true if the gentleman had not moved to adjourn.

Mr. MADDEN. But I did not withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. I know, but you can not do those two things at one time.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. May I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that there is a way to determine this vote. If the gentleman will move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was rejected, we will get the direct vote on the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] wants to make that motion, and the Chair is going to recognize him.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made the point of no quorum, and then suppose some other gentleman really made the motion to adjourn; in that case it would be very clear that the motion to adjourn being defeated, the roll call on the point of no quorum would occur on the question pending.

Mr. GARNER. On the question of adjournment?

Mr. CRAMTON. On the mere fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made the point of no quorum and also made the motion to adjourn, with sufficient time elapsing here for certain gentlemen to confer with him——

The SPEAKER. When the Chair announced that the conference report was defeated nobody demanded a division.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the gentleman from Illinois immediately made the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Immediately moved to adjourn.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the Speaker will pardon me, he did not do it immediately. He first made the point of no quorum, and then when certain gentlemen conferred with him, at their solicitation he made the motion to adjourn, and the record will bear out that statement.

Mr. FLOOD. It was a withdrawal of the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman on the motion to adjourn, which he had absolutely the right to do and which was his duty to do, because that is the supreme motion in the House. That was voted down. Then the gentleman made the point of order that there was no quorum present, and the Chair counted and found there was not any.

Mr. CRAMTON. But he had previously made the same point.

The SPEAKER. I know.

Mr. FLOOD. He did not insist on it.

The SPEAKER. He superseded that himself by making a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the Speaker indulge me just a moment?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] immediately following the announcement of the Chair that the noes had it was upon a question that requires a quorum of the House to carry or to defeat. The motion to adjourn does not require a quorum. Therefore the motion to adjourn did not withdraw the point of no quorum, and that point was made immediately following the announcement of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. One gentleman at one time can not make those two points. Now, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] moves to reconsider the vote by which this conference report was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. How are you going to do that without a quorum?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask how the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] voted, in order to see whether or not he can make the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made the point of no quorum, and the truth of it is you can not turn a wheel until you get a quorum.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. GARNER. The question is on adjournment.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBOTT. Suppose we adjourn now, what would be the status of this?

The SPEAKER. The conference report is rejected if you adjourn now.

Mr. GILLETT. Would not a motion to reconsider be pending to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the Chair is going to inquire if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] had the right to make the motion. Which side did the gentleman vote on?

Mr. STEENERSON. I was present and was engaged in reading the conference report when the vote was had.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota did not vote. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] moves a call of the House because there is no quorum here.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GILLETT. It seems to me we want to meet the wishes of the House, and I suspect the House would like to adjourn and have this pending. If we adjourn now, would not the motion to reconsider be pending to-morrow morning?

Mr. FOSTER. Not without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider could be made to-morrow morning, and it does not take a quorum to adjourn; and if anybody wants to move to adjourn, the Chair will entertain the motion.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Suppose the House should decline to adjourn, and a quorum should come, and a motion to reconsider were made. It would bring the direct question before the House?

The SPEAKER. Of course it would.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair has decided that there is no quorum present, is any motion in order except a call of the House? I move a call of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not competent, where a viva voce was taken, for any Member of the House to make a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. Yes; that is right. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] moves to adjourn.

Mr. FIELDS. I withdraw that motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky withdraws his motion to adjourn. Those in favor of a call of the House will say "aye"; those opposed will say "no."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the motion of adjournment was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], was it not?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. WALSH. A point of no quorum was made on it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARNER. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 108, noes 31.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House is ordered. The Clerk will call the roll, the Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Emerson	Kelley, Mich.	Sabath

Eagle	Kahn	Rowland	Young, Tex.
Elston	Kehoe	Russell	Zihlman.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 297 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. As I understand the rule, when a motion to reconsider has been made, as mine has been made, it has the same privilege as the matter to which it relates, and it may be called up at any time, and therefore I would have the right to call up this motion to reconsider on to-morrow or at some later time?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to reconsider is made, anybody has the right to call it up after it is made.

Mr. STEENERSON. I made the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not made the motion yet.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. But there was no quorum present, and in the absence of a quorum the gentleman could not make the motion.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then I move to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was rejected.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, in order to get a direct vote on that proposition, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be regarded as reconsidered, and that a direct vote be taken by the House upon agreeing to the conference report without debate. I understand that is satisfactory to gentlemen on both sides.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the conference report was rejected be considered as reconsidered, and that a direct vote be taken on the conference report without debate. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman incorporate with his request another request for the reading of the amendment, so that it can be clearly understood?

Mr. KITCHIN. It has already been read. Let us have a vote on it directly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the gentleman make it clear that this is going to be a direct vote on the adoption of the conference report, and that those who vote in favor of the conference report will vote for the retention of pneumatic tubes until the Interstate Commerce Commission reports, and those who vote against the conference report will vote against the retention of the tubes.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman request that the motion be read again?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; that has just been explained.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman to permit the amendment to be read, since it incorporates an entirely new proposition—that of referring the whole matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, if this is going to be argued in this insidious way, let us talk it out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. HELM. Reserving the right to object to the proposition made by the gentleman from North Carolina, when is this vote to be taken?

Mr. GARNER. Now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina that the vote by which the conference report be rejected be considered as reconsidered, and that a direct vote be taken on the conference report without debate?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. Those in favor of agreeing to the conference report will, when their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed will vote "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 150, nays 149, answered "present" 2, not voting 130, as follows:

Mr. WISE with Mr. NORTON.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from New York, Mr. DONOVAN, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. McKEOWN. I withdraw my vote of "nay" and answer "present."

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote "nay."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening, when his name should have been called?

Mr. GORDON. I was in the smoking room. I heard my name called, but I did not get in in time to answer.

Mr. DYER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. Does the rule apply to those who were in the Chamber or those who were out in the lobby?

The SPEAKER. In the Chamber. Nobody can vote who was outside of the Hall when his name was called.

Mr. GORDON. I heard my name called, but I did not get in in time to answer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman made the statement that he was in the smoking room.

Mr. GORDON. That is true.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman was in the smoking room, he can not vote.

Mr. GORDON. I heard my name called, but did not get in in time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must be present and listening. He might be in the gallery listening, but that would not be sufficient. On this vote there are 149 yeas and 149 nays. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he voted "yea."

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recapitulation of the vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks for a recapitulation and the Clerk will recapitulate the vote. Gentlemen will take their seats and give attention, for there is no sense in recapitulating the vote unless Members can hear their names.

The vote was recapitulated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire whether the tabulation that has been made is correct as first announced by the tally clerk? I make that inquiry because upon calculation made by myself, which I do not claim to be accurate, it shows 149 yeas and 151 nays.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that in taking the recapitulation he left out the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional affirmative votes: Mr. ROSE and Mr. Speaker CLARK.

Mr. GOOD rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a correction. I voted "present" when my name was called, but subsequently changed the vote from "present" to "yea." It has not been so announced by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. That was changed in the recapitulation.

Mr. WALSH. It was not read. The Clerk read the gentleman from Iowa as being among those who voted "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that he read it where it was recorded "yea" and where it was recorded "present."

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, am I recorded as voting?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Clerk informs the Speaker that he did not read the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania first, but he has just now added it to the names of those voting in the affirmative.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I do not like the way that count is going on. I want to make this suggestion also: The Speaker ruled out the vote of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], and the fact is that he was standing in that door. That is a part of this room. He heard his name called. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has a right to make a statement.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Ohio could answer the Clerk called another name, and I think under those circumstances the gentleman ought to be allowed to vote.

The SPEAKER. Here is what the gentleman from Ohio said when the Chair interrogated him: The Chair asked if the gentleman was in the Hall listening, and the Chair's recollection is that the gentleman from Ohio said that he was in the cloakroom. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Ohio if that is not correct?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, Mr. Speaker; although I said that I was in the smoking room.

The SPEAKER. It is commonly called the cloakroom. If he was in the cloakroom, he is not allowed to vote under the rules.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, he was where he heard his name.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but he might have been up in the gallery and heard his name.

Mr. MOON. He ought to have voted if he did hear it.

The SPEAKER. The rules do not permit it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman was entirely satisfied with the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the roll be called on this vote.

The SPEAKER. You can not do that.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I can make the motion to that effect, can I not?

The SPEAKER. On this vote, according to the recapitulation, the yeas are 149 and the nays are 150. The nays have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is evidently confusion at the desk with regard to this vote. I desire to ask whether, upon the recapitulation, the yeas did not gain one vote rather than lose one?

The SPEAKER. Well, that was the conclusion the Chair drew about the vote of the gentleman from Iowa, but the tally clerks handed the count up for recapitulation and the yeas were 149 and nays 150.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will bear with me a minute, when the Speaker voted and broke the tie it made the vote 149 and 150. Now, upon the recapitulation there was a gain of 1 vote, which would have made a net gain of 2——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, does that vote reject the conference report?

The SPEAKER. This vote as handed up to the Speaker by the tally clerks stands 149 yeas and 150 nays.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a recapitulation of that vote.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NOLAN. Due to the confusion regarding this vote, is it not possible to get another recapitulation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Speaker has announced three separate votes, I ask for a recapitulation of the vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was rejected and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never announced the vote. The yeas are 149, the nays are 150, and the conference report is rejected.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a recapitulation of that vote.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, Mr. DYER, and Mr. MCARTHUR. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 72.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recapitulation of that vote.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. Fifty-six gentlemen have arisen, a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 93, nays 110, answered "present" 5, not voting 222, as follows:

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STEENERSON. To a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will wait until we get through with this vote.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the Hall, but I desire to be recorded as "present."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "yea."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall and listening when his name was called?

Mr. WHEELER. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rules then.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] stated that he was not in the Hall, but asked to be marked as "present." Is that permissible?

The SPEAKER. That is what has been the practice here for some time. I do not know for how long. He did not vote "yea," and did not vote "nay," and asked to be marked "present."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege of the House.

The SPEAKER. The first thing to do is to decide this vote.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not want the announcement of adjournment——

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman can not interfere with the announcement of this vote.

Mr. WALSH. You can not interrupt an announcement of the vote by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can not interrupt the announcement of the vote.

The SPEAKER. The "yeas" are 93 and the "nays" are 110 and answered "present" 5, and the House declines to adjourn.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order, and the point of order is that there is not a quorum of the House, and therefor I move a call of the House. There can be no proceedings, as there is not a quorum in the House.

Mr. DYER. I make the point that the vote shows there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The vote shows that there is no quorum here. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] makes the point of order there is no quorum present, and therefore no business can be transacted.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, pending that——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to know whether the Speaker is prepared to make an announcement in regard to changes of vote?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker announced the vote half an hour ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask if the Speaker has had any additional report from the tally clerk?

The SPEAKER. The last report from the tellers confirms the announcement the Speaker made.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not a parliamentary inquiry, but it is an inquiry. The matter of the conference report is settled, is it not?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet and announced that as a matter of privilege——

The SPEAKER. I know, but the gentleman can not address himself to a question of personal privilege without a quorum, and the point is made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that there is no quorum present, and the roll call showed there was not. So you are stock-still.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 91.

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I demand the regular order—the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum present. You can not have a call of committees with no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. You could if no one made the point of no quorum.

Mr. McARTHUR. I make it, then.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be delighted to recognize the gentleman from Mississippi to file his conference report if he could. But the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McARTHUR] made a point of no quorum.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question affecting the dignity of the House.

Mr. McARTHUR. I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HEFLIN. I renew the point, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The conference report can not be filed by the gentleman from Mississippi with no quorum present. The Chair will ascertain if there is a quorum present. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-two gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Two gentlemen move that the House adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STEENERSON and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania demanded a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 91.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of adjourning will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 125, nays 89, answered "present" 1, not voting 215, as follows:

was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. KENYON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 270), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on June 27, 1918, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 4557. An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes; and

S. 3391. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed to G. H. Beckwith for certain land within the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I believe the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] had not concluded his address to the Senate when we took a recess.

June 27, 1918.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to consume a brief time in presenting a view of this matter which I think has not been sufficiently emphasized.

First, in order to keep history fairly straight, I must be permitted to say that on the 16th day of May, a month and a half ago, I introduced a resolution calling for certain information, which had immediate relation to the proper operation of the draft law, from the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretaries of Agriculture and of Commerce and of Labor, and the Provost Marshal General. If this resolution had been adopted, in my opinion, we would have had information that would have made it imperative for the Senate to have enlarged the ages within which the draft could operate; but on the pretense—I call it "pretense"; I do not mean that in a harsh sense—that it was necessary for the Military Affairs Committee to examine it, it was referred, after some remarks upon my part, to the Committee on Military Affairs, and, in so far as I know, the committee took no action upon it. I regret it very much, because if the resolution had passed, as I think it ought to have passed, immediately and without reference to the committee, we would have had official and somewhat authentic information upon this subject. It has not been difficult to acquire. A little industry would have enabled any one to collect the information necessary; but it would have been of vast use to the Senate if we could have had directly from these sources the information upon which, eventually, these questions must be determined.

I want it remembered also that on the 2d day of June, being the day after the military bill was reported from the House, I offered an amendment which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which directly brought to the attention of the committee the propriety of both increasing and decreasing the draft ages.

I mention these things without the least intention of reflecting upon the committee or any member of the committee, but we at least have had the subject before the Senate sufficiently to have become fairly familiar with it and long enough to enable us to reach a just conclusion upon it.

Mr. President, the chief question is not one of securing an army. That must be apparent to anyone. We have an abundance of men between 21 and 30 to compose an army much greater than we could by any possibility maintain in Europe. The chief question, the most important question, is to maintain a proper balance between the military forces of the United States and the industrial forces of the United States. It is a balance which must be maintained if we would make either our productive capacity sufficient to maintain the Army or make our Army effectual. Everybody must realize that. There can be no controversy whatever about it. We have a very great shortage of labor. It will be with immense difficulty that we can maintain the Army which must be maintained in Europe if our arms are to be victorious. I think it is for Congress to determine the balance between the civil and the military forces. I think it is directly devolved upon Congress by the Constitution, and, moreover, the highest considerations require Congress to perform this fundamental duty.

Of what value is it to give to the President of the United States the power or authority to raise an indefinite army unless we at the same time make some definite provision through which, and by which, he can maintain the necessary balance between production and fighting?

I hoped that Congress would assume its proper function and discharge its real responsibility, but I do not intend to make any opposition whatever to the unlimited power given to the President to raise an army of any proportions which he deems requisite. However, I do want to give him the opportunity, if we are not going to exercise it ourselves, of maintaining between the forces of production and the military forces of the country that relation which will enable us to support the army which we create. It is beyond my comprehension, it is utterly inexplicable to me, that any influence in the United States from any Government official should oppose the widest and the greatest opportunity to enable us to maintain the largest army of which we are capable, because there is another limitation upon the size of our Army. It does not rest alone or even chiefly in the appropriations which we make from time to time. There is just one limitation which must be observed from which we can not by any possibility escape. It is the limitation put by nature and circumstance upon the people of this country that forbids the raising of a larger army than we can maintain in Europe or on the fighting front of France. But we are so obviously short of man power that it ought to shock and alarm us every time we look upon it. We have not enough men to properly operate our war factories. We have not enough men to operate our transportation system. We have not enough men to work upon our farms; and my prediction is that a very considerable part of the harvest with which we are about to be blessed will be lost because we will not be able to secure the labor with which to reap the harvest.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the Chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Can the Senator explain to me why it is that in a country having all the raw material that we have we can not put into the field a number proportionate to our population compared with that of England or Scotland or any of those countries?

Mr. CUMMINS. The reason, Mr. President, is that we are attempting to supply Great Britain and France and Italy and other countries with a very large proportion of the things which they consume, and whether explicable or not the fact remains that we have not enough productive labor to accomplish the purpose we have in view.

Mr. McCUMBER. Are we doing any more in providing for the necessities of our allies than Great Britain is doing to supply the necessities of her allies?

Mr. CUMMINS. A great deal more, in my opinion. But it does not make any difference what the reasons are, the fact remains. We lack men upon railroads, we lack men on the farms, we lack men in the shipyards, we lack men in the munitions factories, and in the various activities of industrial life.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think an explanation can be given, but I will not take the time now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly it may be so, and I hope the Senator will be able to give it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will.

Mr. CUMMINS. We shall have to coerce in some fashion or other the influences which lead to productive labor. We must assign in some way or other men to the places where they will be most useful. We must in some degree so arrange our affairs that each man will not only be productive but can reach the maximum of his producing capacity.

Mr. President, these are our imperative obligations. We must first create an army. We must be able to supply that army at long distance with all which it requires to make it effective. We are assuming the most difficult and onerous obligation that ever existed, because we are using our energy at such long range. That is unavoidable, and it simply requires that much more diligence, that much more organization, that much more assignment that much more intelligent supervision over the affairs of the country.

We must in the next place produce enough to feed our civil population. We have about 100,000,000 people here who must be fed, who must be clothed, who must be supplied with all the necessaries of life, for if we fail in that respect our Nation falls into discontent and our arms become ineffective.

Third, we must supply the actual, positive necessities of our allies. If we were to fail for a single month in this respect, the arms of Great Britain and of France and of Italy would become "as idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean."

These are our obligations. If the Senator from North Dakota can point out how this labor can be secured without enlarging the draft age, I think the country will be greatly indebted to him. I suppose if we had men and women who were entirely unselfish, who would voluntarily devote every energy which they have to necessary production as distinguished from nonessential production, it would go a great way toward accomplishing the purposes.

I come now to the point of considering how we can best distribute our man power. As you know, we have withdrawn from the ordinary channels of business—that is, the business in which people had formerly been engaged—not only the men whom we have enlisted in the Army, not only the great civil forces which we have gathered for the purpose of discharging the duties of government, but we have dislocated our system by pouring into necessary channels—I agree that they are necessary, shipbuilding, munition factories, and the like—so many of our men that other industries and other useful occupations languish and suffer.

Our man power is not utilized. I venture to say, and I believe it can be established, that there are at least 1,200,000 men between 30 and 40 who had far better have been assigned to military duty instead of a similar number of men between the ages of 21 and 30. It would not have been necessary to have assigned all of them, but they could have borne their proportion. There are nearly 1,000,000 between 30 and 40 who have no gainful occupation whatever, and even if these men had been classified with the men between 21 and 30, it would have relieved many hundred thousand men engaged in useful and necessary occupation between 21 and 30. We would in that way have actually added to our man power, in my judgment—it is, of course, in part an estimate—we would have added before class 1 had been exhausted a million men to our effective working useful laborers, and that without the slightest infraction upon the right of a workingman to choose his own occupation, and without the least infringement upon their privilege against the conscription of labor.

Let us see. For the moment I disregard the men above 45, although I think there should be an assimilation and an assignment of men above 45, just as I think there should be imperatively one below 45. There were registered of men between 21 and 30, in round numbers, 9,500,000. There are between the ages of 18 and 45 in the country, omitting the men between 21 and 30, 13,998,049 men. I am using the percentage of increase since the census of 1910 that has been adopted by the Provost Marshal General's office—that is to say, I have added 15 per cent over the census of 1910 in order to take in the growth of the last 8 years.

Mr. WARREN. Taking them by States separately?

Mr. CUMMINS. All together; all the returns from the States.

Mr. WARREN. The sum of them, all together?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; the entire man power between the ages of 18 and 45 will be found to be 23,498,049 men. You will remark that the provision made by the Provost Marshal General's office is not just the division made by the Census Bureau—that is, the Census Bureau classifies men as engaged in gainful pursuits and otherwise. There were engaged in gainful pursuits men of 18 and over, and I am estimating the men between 16 and 20, giving to each a half, because those are the periods taken by the Census Bureau—30,970,203 men. These include all ages without limit above 18 years. Engaged in gainful pursuits from 18 to 45, 22,500,520 men, about 1,000,000 men fewer than the population of men between 18 and 45. Not only so, but there are a great many men between the ages of 30 and 40 or 45 who are engaged in gainful pursuits who are not engaged in any productive or necessary or essential pursuit.

I commend to the chairman of the committee that problem. Why will you not give to the President or to the Provost Marshal General or to the Secretary of War the authority to call some of these men above 31 years of age into the service of the country who are vastly less valuable to the industries of the country than many of the men between 21 and 31? Remember that our Army is absolutely limited in number by the production of the country, by its power not only to produce arms and munitions of war, but to produce ships and crops and every other thing that is necessary in order to enable the American people to live; that is the real crux of the difficulty; and there is no other limit, for if we could produce enough to maintain an army of 10,000,000 men we could send them to France as rapidly as we could build ships for them and train them; but unless the labor of this country is reorganized in some way or other, so that every energy we have will be utilized to its highest degree, unless we take measures immediately for this mobilization of our labor we shall not be able to send to France above three millions or three and a half millions of men, and I doubt whether we shall be able to send even as large a number as that.

You can not escape from that limitation. Neither the Secretary of War nor the President, assuming they have prevision at all, would dare to put in France an army which they can not sustain. They would not dare to put into France an army which they can not sustain, together with the sustenance that must be given to our allies.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is just one suggestion that has induced me to abandon my position—the opinion along the lines that the Senator is now arguing—and to accept the suggestion of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff; that is the danger of having more troops here than we can get over with the shipping facilities that we have, and then getting over more than we can support.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but, Mr. President, we are not required to draw a single man into the Army who can not be equipped, who can not be transported; there is no suggestion that the President ought to call any man who can not be and who will not be within the capacity of the country to equip.

My objection, however, is as against a moment's delay. The difficulty is you are calling in every day men who ought to be left at home and you are failing to call the men who can be spared without injury to the industries or the production of the country, and the longer you delay the more injury will you do. It is idle, it seems to me, even to suggest that class 1 should be entirely exhausted, if there are men above 30 who can enter the Army, or any branch of the military service, and render the same efficient work for their country and leave a better and a higer effectiveness in labor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand it, they have placed in class 1 those who can best be taken first.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I merely desire to make one statement. The Secretary of War and Gen. March advise us that they could make no speed by the adoption of this increase of age and decrease of age, because in ample time for those that they would be ready to call we could pass that legislation, together with still further provisions which might be necessary for the call immediately upon our reassembling, and that at that time they would be able to give us information growing out of conditions in Europe and negotiations with foreign countries that would be necessary to determine how fast we could put the soldiers in France and how best we could keep them there.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is a part of the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia which I think is material to the inquiry, and part of it, if I may say so without offense, which is not. The part of the inquiry which relates to the transportation of men to France is, in my judgment, utterly immaterial, because the plan proposed in the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]—which is the equivalent of the amendment which I offered about two weeks ago—does not relate to the increase of men actually taken from the ranks of the people, except in so far as the President may see fit to take them. The part of it which is material—and I beg the attention of the Senator from Georgia to this point—is, as he says, that we may yet have time to change the law before the men in class 1 are taken. I have seen the evils of procrastination so often; I have seen this country approach emergencies so frequently, and emergencies without being able adequately to meet them, that I am afraid of delay. But that is not all.

It is a false theory to say that all the men in class 1 ought to be taken before anybody else is taken; it is entirely erroneous. If the Provost Marshal General had had the latitude which he ought to have had from the very beginning, class 1 would not have been precisely as it is; there would have been another classification, and many of the men who are now in class 1 would have remained at home at work producing something for their country, and many of the men who are above 31 or 30 would have gone into the Army. In that way we would have raised the numbers with entire ease and have very largely added to the effective labor of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has not the Provost Marshal General classified the drafted men now in class 1 according to the law as it stands?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is entirely a matter of regulation. He can put anybody in class 1 that he likes. The law did not classify men into classes 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has he not eliminated the needed men to whom the Senator refers, who are required in the industries? Has he not very carefully restricted the calling of men so as to avoid invading that class?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt that the Provost Marshal General did the very best he could with the limited number of men within his control. He could control only the men between 21 and 31. Here is John Smith, who is engaged in some useful occupation; he is unmarried and has no dependents; he is in class 1, the preferred class. Here is John Jones, 31 years of age, who has no occupation at all, who is producing nothing that is useful and necessary for his country. Now, who ought to go first?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not true that in the classification even a single man who is especially needed is carried lower down in the classification, and that the very principle to which the Senator refers is invoked in making the various classifications?

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course there is great latitude in the classifications; but that is not true and can not be true. I do not remember just how many, but originally something like three or four million men were in class 1——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not understand that there were that many.

Mr. CUMMINS. They were not classified in just that way when the first draft was made; but in the same classification there were originally, I am sure, three or four million men. Now, the Senator from Georgia does not think that some of those men were not at work?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; they were at work, but they were largely unskilled labor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, unskilled labor is just as necessary for this country as skilled labor, although possibly we may not need quite so much of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are vastly more of that class, and all of them of the draft age could not be exempted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator another question. Is it proposed, by increasing the age limit and lowering it, to change the men in class 1, and not to draw those men in the category to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no provision of that sort. The President has complete power to classify these men in any way that he sees fit; there is no limitation upon that. All that I ask is that the man who is not doing anything shall be called to the colors before the man who is doing something.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But, Mr. President, will it not require additional legislation applicable to our draft system to make such further classifications, and if we were to agree to this amendment and it were put into force, would they not at once fall into class 1 just as they do now? Why, then, increase or lower the age limit?

Mr. CUMMINS. They would; but does the Senator understand that the law made the classifications?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that they have been made under the interpretation by the department of the requirements of the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no; the——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will pardon me, I am very desirous of taking this up a little later, when we can go further by statute and regulate the plan of classification.

Mr. CUMMINS. We will at least save some time and secure some men for the Army who can be better spared than the men who are now in it if we proceed now, and if we desire to make a change later we can do so. There are no classifications in the law except for semimilitary service and for exemptions. The President can classify them in any way that he sees fit. The President could have put all in the same class if he had wanted to do so. His only obligation was to except certain men who were absolutely necessary for certain service.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator if he has made any estimate of the number of men between 18 and 45 who are engaged in no gainful occupation whatever?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I have.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator give us the number of those men who might well be called into the new Army?

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, it is only an estimate to the extent that the divisions made by the Census Bureau are of men between 16 and 20, 20 and 40, and so on. I must therefore indulge in an estimate, although I think it is fairly accurate. The total number of men engaged in gainful pursuits between the ages of 18 and 45 is 22,500,520; the total number of men between the ages of 18 and 45, as I estimate it, is 23,998,049.

Mr. McCUMBER. Leaving a difference of what?

Mr. CUMMINS. Leaving a difference of about 1,500,000 men.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say to the Senator that I made a similar computation, including men between the ages of 18 and 62, taking as the basis the figures of the Census Bureau of 1910 and adding 15 per cent, the same as the Senator has done. That is, of course, before the war. That left about 6,000,000 men in the United States who were not engaged in gainful occupations. If I would reduce it down to men of 45 years, taking out the difference, it would leave, I think, nearly 4,000,000 men.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not arrive at those results; I did not go higher than 45 years, and naturally the number of idle men, or men without any gainful occupation, increases very rapidly after 45.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wish to say that I think the Senator's estimates are exceedingly conservative.

Mr. CUMMINS. I regard them as quite below the real figures rather than above. They are enough to emphasize the absolute necessity of immediate legislation upon this question if we intend to do anything to preserve our industrial power, and without our industrial power our Army is so limited that we will not be able to accomplish the best results.

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS yielded the floor for the day.]

Friday, June 28, 1918.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I shall occupy very little time this morning, I hope, but I can not close what I have to say without bringing to the attention of the Senate what I regard as one of the most comprehensive articles which has yet appeared touching the very subject that we are now discussing—the man power of the United States. It is an article by Mark Sullivan, appearing in one of the recent numbers of Collier's. I quote from this article:

> Now, let us see just what has happened to this 35,000,000 since the war began.

He assumes that the man power of the United States is 35,000,000—

> The first thing to bear in mind is that with the beginning of the European war the greatest source of increase for our man power was cut off. We used to get an increase of a million man power a year through immigration. We now get substantially nothing. Few people recognize the significance, in a business and economic sense, of this cutting off of immigration. The immigrant was almost the only source of what we call "day labor," the men who do the building and repairing of railroads, the mending of streets and roads, mining, and the rough work of steel mills and other factories. We have gone on as if this source of our labor were a perpetual fountain. We have not stopped to consider the business and economic and social changes which must come about when the fountain runs dry, and we are compelled to adapt ourselves to a condition very strange to us. Moreover, an immigrant raised to maturity, with all the expense of his nurture and training paid by his own country, delivered at our gates free of charge as a working unit of man power, was a valuable asset. Valued even in the way that slaves were valued before the Civil War, and taking into account the change of standards, he was worth at least $2,000. A million immigrants a year were worth $2,000,000,000. That is, roughly, equal to the value of our wheat crop and our corn crop added together. If our entire wheat crop and our entire corn crop were complete failures in any one year, we should hear a great deal about it. As a matter of fact, the cutting off of our immigration of a million man power a year was a more serious matter than the loss of our wheat and corn crops. For the cessation of immigration was not for one year merely but for as long as the war lasts—and it may very well be for always.

Again:

> After the cessation of the accustomed increase, the most obvious thing that has happened to our man power is that 2,000,000 of it between the ages of 21 and 31 have gone into the Army and are no longer at their accustomed posts in factories, mines, offices, and farms. This 2,000,000 is the best of our man power. It was at the age of greatest vitality. The loss of it to our industries is greater than the mere figures indicate. Two million man power (a year from now it will be 3,000,000; two years from now it will be 5,000,000) out of our total 35,000,000 have ceased completely to be normal producers of goods. (Incidentally, these millions have not only ceased to be normal producers; in addition, as soldiers, they have become larger consumers than they were before of food, clothes, and other materials.)
> Here, then, is the first subtraction: 2,000,000 from 35,000,000 leaves 33,000,000. But this is only the first, and not the largest, of many subtractions.

Subtract another half million for the Navy.

Subtract another half million for shipbuilding.

At this point it might be appropriate to ask some of the "business as usual" advocates just how business can be as usual, just how 32,000,000 man power can do the amount of work and business usually done by 35,000,000. As a matter of fact, we do not have even 32,000,000 man power left available for business as usual. For the deductions just pointed out are not by any means all the deductions that have occurred. They are not even the largest deductions. I have set them down first merely because they are the most obvious. They are the best ones for illustrating the thing that is happening. They involve actual dislocations of man power, men who go away, not only from their accustomed pursuits, but also from their accustomed homes. But it must be remembered that man power can be diverted without being dislocated. A man may continue to live in the same house, and use the same pick, and work in the same mine, and get his wages from the same boss; but if the ton of ore he digs finds its ultimate destination in rifles instead of piano wires, he is a unit of man power subtracted from its normal uses. And these diversions are enormous.

Again:

The sum of it is pretty accurately known to those whose business it is to form expert judgment on such subjects. For example, Mr. Frank Vanderlip, president of the National City Bank of New York, has found an ingenious and convincing way of arriving at the number of our man power which has been diverted from normal pursuits into war work. He first points out that the total amount of production that all our man power can do in a year is about $30,000,000,000. Then he sets down alongside this fact the other fact that the appropriations made by the United States Government for the present year are $19,000,000,000. That is to say, the Government is going to buy for war purposes (allowing for some millions for duplications) about one-half of the entire productive capacity of the country. In other words, the Government is going to hire for war work, and take away from normal pursuits, about one-half the entire man power of the country. That would be between 17,000,000 and 18,000,000 of our man power. Others estimate the number, for the present, as somewhat lower. They say that, although it is true that the country, in an industrial way, is now more than 50 per cent at war, various considerations reduce the total of man power diverted. A little later on, they say, the diversion will amount to 50 per cent.

Another brief extract and I shall have finished:

Out of all the mass of figures, exact and estimated, the one net fact, the "red-ink" fact, as the accountants express it, is this: As compared with normal peace-time production, there is a labor shortage in the United States of at least 15,000,000 man power. What this means is that if we attempt to carry on the war, and at the same time continue "business as usual," we shall lack 15,000,000 man power. We can not do both.

Again:

The farms of the United States, this year and so long as the war lasts, must supply food not only for the population which normally depends on our farm products, but, in addition, for large portions of the population of France, England, Italy, Belgium, and some neutral countries. They must do this or some of our allies must starve. Now, farming is at all times our biggest consumer of man power. In peace times the number of man power engaged in it is about 12,000,000—about 6,000,000 farm owners and 6,000,000 farm laborers. Whether this number of man power engaged in farming has been increased during the war I do not know. It is a fact that the quantity of farm products has been enlarged. The farmers of the United States planted and harvested last year the largest acreage on record. Secretary Houston believes that in the present year even that record will be increased. It is worth while to pause for a moment and consider what the American farmer accomplished last year; he increased the number of horses in the country, in spite of the shipments abroad for war purposes; he raised more cows; he raised more beef cattle; he raised more pigs.

From this it may fairly be argued that the portion of our man power engaged in farming must have increased. But assume that it remains at the normal 12,000,000. Then we have this condition: About 18,000,000 of our man power either has been or soon will be diverted for war; out of the remaining 18,000,000, 12,000,000 are engaged in farming. Seen in this cold statistical light, the prospects of "business as usual" do not look very up and coming.

Of the 18,000,000 man power required for war, none can be taken from farming. They must come from somewhere else.

Now, there is one other of our great occupations which must be kept up to the normal man power. It must be kept up to normal; it ought to be increased. The railroads are a most essential war industry. And they are in a bad way. We had a transportation failure last winter which caused us much inconvenience and held back our war work. (The coal famine was really a transportation failure. Those who are competent to know say it was almost wholly a lack of cars. They say there was never a day when a car remained empty at the mine mouth. The coal was always there; the lack was cars to carry it away.) And the transportation failure is really just as serious to-day as it was last winter. If you doubt this, try to get a carload of coal or a carload of bricks. This transportation failure is going to continue to grow worse for a long time to come. Just how and why it will express itself would be easy to tell if there were room. But we are only concerned with its relation to man power. The man power normally engaged in railroad work is about 2,500,000. The late James J. Hill, before he died, and before the war began, said the railroads ought to have a billion dollars a year spent on them for five years to bring them up to good condition. That is the same as saying that even in peace times the railroads needed a million more man power. And it is not only the railroads. It is the same in every branch of the transportation industry.

Mr. President, there can be no more graphic statement of the industrial situation than is contained in this article. Its conclusions are obvious: We must husband, we must direct, we must in some way or other secure the very maximum of our man power in industry if we are to carry on the war successfully.

I desire also to call attention to an editorial in one of the leading agricultural newspapers of the country, a paper whose editor is one of the most thoughtful and far-seeing men of our times. I will read but briefly from it:

[From Wallace's Farmer of June 28, 1918.]

It is said that the last call for troops—which is just being made—will practically exhaust class 1. Our boys are being rushed to France very rapidly. It was semiofficially stated last week that up to that time 900,000 of our troops were in France or on the water. Evidently the Government plans contemplate the raising of an army of about 3,000,000 men as quickly as possible—

In fact, it is about 3,400,000 men—

This last call for class 1 men will take many hundreds of thousands of men from the farms just at a time when they are most needed. Because of the exceptionally favorable conditions for work during March and April, a large acreage of crops has been put in, and there is every promise of an abundant yield; but the steady draft upon the farm boys will make it exceedingly difficult to harvest these crops in good season.

The "work or fight" order which is just now being put in force will tend to relieve the situation somewhat. Large numbers of men in the cities who are engaged in what are considered nonproductive industries are now seeking employment in the essential industries, and some of these will go to the farms. There will not be enough of them, however, to relieve the farm labor situation sufficiently, and by another year it will be extremely difficult for the farmers of the country to maintain the necessary acreage of cultivated crops.

As we have already pointed out, it is perfectly clear that the farm boy is not going to be exempted from military service simply because he is a farmer. In fact, he has not been exempted. The first National Army had 26 per cent of its men and boys from the farms, a greater number both actually and in proportion to the numbers registered than from any other class. Neither is it going to be practical to furlough boys to help grow and harvest the crops. We might as well understand that this war must be won by fighting men, and when our young men are called to the Army their most important job is to learn how to fight vigorously. They can not do this if their training is interrupted.

As we see it, about the only practical way to relieve this steady drain upon farm labor, as we have heretofore pointed out, is to enlarge the draft upward and take in men up to at least the age of 45. The towns and cities are full of men between the age of 32 and 45, who could be spared for army service without seriously dislocating the essential industries.

Finally the editorial concludes:

Let us take in the men between 32 and 45 during the next six months, and then see where we stand. One of the difficulties of the situation is—

I hesitate to read this because it depicts a condition so well known here, and so little known elsewhere, that it comes as a revelation—that our Representatives in Congress seem to have lost their initiative, and are simply following the wishes of the administration. There are not many people connected with the administration who have adequate knowledge of agricultural conditions, and it is time for those who do have such knowledge to make their voices heard. For to win the war we must have food as well as fighting men and guns. In the interests of the common good, therefore, we hope that our readers will write very plain letters to their Senators and Representatives, and urge the amendment of the draft law as we have suggested.

Mr. President, it is one of the strange situations that substantially every Member of the Senate, without regard to division—for there are no divisions in the prosecution of the war—substantially every Member of the Senate is in favor of increasing the draft age to 40 or 45 years. Every Member of the Senate recognizes that it is not only wise to do it, but that it is imperative that it shall be done if we are to maintain our Army and our industries at the highest possible point. Then, may I ask, why do we not do it? It will not disturb a single regulation. It will repose the whole power in the hands of the President. He will have no fetters upon him. It will simply open for him a larger repository of man power. It is to me utterly inexplicable that there should be the least hesitation with regard to the matter.

I believe that if we had done what we ought to have done in the beginning of the war, assuming that it was wise to resort to the conscript system—and I am not protesting against that—if we had put within the draft age the men between 20 or 21 and 45, we would have just as large an Army, or a larger and more effective Army, and we would have, in addition, more than a million men who could be employed in industrial pursuits and in essential production that are not and can not be so employed at this time.

Senators may look upon that with complacency; Senators may think it is a little thing that we are a million men short now of the number that would have been at our command for effective and essential labor and for an Army as large or larger than we now have, but the more we can increase our labor in raising crops, in building ships, and in carrying on munition factories, the more rapidly will we be able to transport soldiers to the field of battle.

Mr. President, this is peculiarly, indeed solely, a subject for Congress. It is in no wise a subject for the War Department. I fear that we are about to remit it to the War Department; but if we do, we will make just the same mistake that we have made heretofore.

I do not like to criticize the progress of industry and the utilization of our man power by the Secretary of War, and I do not do so. I desire to say that, so far as Gen. Crowder is concerned, I believe that he has done everything within his power to bring together the largest number of fighting men consistent with the maintenance of industry, but he has opportunity only to mobilize and control the men under 31. You have shorn him of the power, you have deprived him of the opportunity to do the thing that he would have done, and ought to have done, and we are going forward to commit the very same mistake that has inhered in all our preparations. The Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff understand, I assume, perfectly the movements of armies; they know where soldiers ought to gather; they know how they ought to fight; but they do not know this problem as well as you know it, and they can not know it as well as you know it. The responsibility will be yours; it will not be that of the Secretary of War; and I shudder when I think of the apparent inclination on the part of the Senate to shirk its duty and to postpone for some future consideration the vital matter of increasing the number of men who can be brought within the draft, in order that we may increase the industrial force of the Nation.

Mr. President, the man—and I hesitate to speak of him, because I fear constantly that I may bring him into collision with his superiors, and I do not want to do that—but the man who understands the subject better than anyone else under the sun, the man whose wisdom and ingenuity have developed probably the best system for the draft, so far as we can bring men within the draft, is Gen. Crowder. He believes, he knows, that this draft age ought to be increased; he makes no concealment of it. He has given hours of study to it, where others have given moments of study to it. It is no secret that he regards the enlargement of the draft age as vital if the business of the country is to be adjusted and properly adjusted as between fighting men and working men. Why will you not listen to him rather than to others who, however earnest they may be in their efforts to reach a proper conclusion, have not had the opportunity to do it, and who are not as well prepared to do it, as the Members of the Senate, for they, looking at the problem as a war problem entirely, absorbed with the movement of troops and the infinite intricacies of that phase of our affairs, can not reflect upon this question as you reflect upon it. I believe you all are convinced that the draft age must be increased. Every moment that is allowed to pass sends some men into the Army who ought not to enter the Army, and holds some men from the Army who ought to be in the Army, if we are to use to the best effect our entire resources.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question for information?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Has Gen. Crowder suggested in any of his testimony the maximum age of those who should be subject to purely military service?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think he has. I do not know whether I am at liberty to disclose it or not, but I have read his testimony, and I am familiar with it.

I assume that we may speak of it with some freedom, and if I gather his view of the matter correctly it is that he is doubtful about the propriety of reducing the age, but he has no question whatever about the wisdom of an increase in the age.

Mr. President, if this war lags, if we are not able to do all that we ought to do in the building of ships, in the manufacture of munitions of war, in the production of food, somebody must suffer; and I think the boys who lie or will lie under the sod in France will pay the penalty for our failure to utilize to the best advantage our man power. I shrink from the thought, and I can not believe that if the Members of the Senate are convinced that the draft age should be enlarged, so as to bring within its scope many men who are not now subject to its control, they will reflect their deliberate judgment in the vote which they will cast. It is too heavy a responsibility to bear. We can not avoid the decision. It is for us to say what men shall be brought within the draft. It will not disturb a single regulation; it will not arrest the progress of selection and distribution a single moment, but we will be able to bring into the Army a million and a half men—and we ought to have them there now—who do not contribute substantially to the production of the country.

I intend to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I shall not discuss it at this time. It is the only material respect in which the amendment which I offered weeks ago differs from the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico, and when the time comes I shall propose this amendment:

Provided, That the regulations relating to classification and exemption shall be so framed that there shall at all times be in civil employments a number of persons sufficient to produce enough to maintain, equip, and transport our military forces, support our civil population, and furnish to the countries cooperating with us in the war the supplies which their necessities demand; and all said regulations shall enforce, in so far as practicable, the duty of every qualified citizen either to labor in a useful way or to bear arms in the defense of his country.

This is a regulation which ought to be legislatively declared. It ought to receive all the power, all the influence, of which it is capable. It ought to sink so deeply into the hearts of the people of this country that it can not be effaced. It ought to stand as a guide, as well as an inspiration, to the War Department as to all the people of the country.

I do not know whether or not the Senator from New Mexico will object to the amendment I intend to offer; but, however that may be, I look upon it as so necessary, so essential, that I shall ask that it be added to the amendment which he has proposed. I may say, in passing, that I want to narrow the differences within the smallest possible compass, and while I believe that the draft ought to include men of 45, or even more, and while I believe that under certain conditions the draft age ought to be decreased or lowered, yet I do not intend, so anxious am I to secure some results, to offer the amendment enlarging the age to 45 or lowering the age under any circumstances below 20.

Mr. President, I submit these suggestions in the very earnest hope that we will not delay a single moment this vital, overwhelmingly important change in our legislative policy.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the arguments have been so voluminous and so forceful concerning the matter of increasing the field from which the Commander in Chief shall draw an additional army that I shall not venture to suggest a single additional argument on that phase of the question; but I do wish to express one other reason which has not yet been discussed on the floor, at least at any length, why I believe that the draft age should begin at 18 and end at not less than 45 years.

Mr. President, we had before us at the very beginning of the raising of this army the alternative of the selective draft or the volunteer system. I think I voice the sentiment of every Senator on the floor when I say that one of the most important factors that affected our decision upon that subject was this: Under the volunteer system we allowed those young boys from 18 up to 30 to volunteer and become soldiers in the American Army. We allowed those in whose hearts the stirring impulses of patriotism were the most resonant to do the fighting, while the others could go into the battle or not, as they saw fit; and my conviction was that I did not want the patriotic boys to do the dying for the country and those whose patriotism was less keen to secure the advantages of a victory secured by their deaths.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to corroborate what the Senator has just said. I was an advocate of the other view; but I was greatly impressed by the forceful manner in which the view was placed before the Senate that if we did not resort to a draft the young men, the patriotic men, and the best men of the country would voluntarily enlist, and that another class, less patriotic and of less value to the Nation, would escape. That was the argument that was made, and I think it was the argument that carried the Senate to the conclusion it reached.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that less patriotic class would be the class of American citizens whose progeny would make up our population in the future.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree to that. I know that while I did entertain the opposite view in the beginning the arguments which were so forcefully and eloquently presented to the Senate, if they did not fully convert me to the other view, certainly carried me a long way in that direction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not only that, Mr. President, but, as bearing upon the same proposition, we knew that there would be some sections of the country where every boy above 18 years of age would flock to the colors, while there would be other sections of the country where perhaps no one would enlist.

We followed that system. I think it has worked splendidly. In every section of the country where there was a degree of reluctance to get into the war, now, when the families see their sons and brothers there, it is creating a wave of patriotism that is taking hold of the hearts and consciences of all the people of that section.

What has that to do with the present proposition of increasing the age limit from 18 to 45? It has this to do with it: Under the law as it now stands you accept the boy of 18 if he will volunteer in the Regular Army; you accept him if he will join the Navy; you accept him if he will enter the Marine Corps; and thousands and tens of thousands and possibly hundreds of thousands of the boys between 18 and 21 years of age, impelled by the impulses of patriotism, are being taken into the Army at 18. Now, Mr. President, if we will take them at that age into the Regular Army, if we will take them at that age into the Navy, if we will take them at that age into the Marine Corps, then I insist that we ought to bring the draft age down to 18. Either place 21 years of age as the limit for volunteers or else place an age for the selective draft that will be the same as the age for volunteers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. In line with what the Senator has said as to the imperfection of the present limits, I have received a number of letters, one of which is illustrative of the point I am about to make.

I received a letter yesterday from a widow who stated that she has three sons. One is 24, and he was drafted. One is 20, just below the draft age, and he volunteered. The other boy, her only remaining son, as soon as he reached 18, volunteered in the Navy. So that that widow has three sons, all of whom are now in the Army or Navy. If the draft system or some other system had been applied by which the Government took jurisdiction of those over 18 for training, if not for fighting, the younger boy could have been held back for a reasonable time, and not sent to do military duty.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not care so much what the age is, provided it is within the limits of reason, and provided that the age of volunteering corresponds with the age of drafting, so that we may have equality of treatment, so that the most patriotic of our population shall not be the first to suffer and the first to die for their country's welfare.

Mr. President, I want at this time to talk a little with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Senator is conversant with the declaration made by ex-President Taft several months ago that the United States Army ought to be 5,000,000 men. The Senator is conversant with the declaration by ex-President Roosevelt, made but a very few months ago, that we ought to have 5,000,000 men in France at the earliest possible time, and that we ought to have them there now if we could get them there. The chairman of the committee listened yesterday to one of the most forceful, one of the most patriotic and truthful, addresses that have been made in the Senate. I refer to the address made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] upon the comparative strength and power of the contending armies upon the battle front. The Senator listened to his eloquent declaration in favor of raising our Army at the earliest possible moment to at least 5,000,000 fighting men. The Senator listened also to a declaration of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], in which he stated, in substance: "I want to go on record as favoring an army now of 5,000,000 men." I want to ask the Senator if he believes we ought to have 5,000,000 men in France at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator has paid any attention to my position on the subject, he will know that some months ago I made a public statement advocating beginning at 2,500,000 men and having 2,500,000 men in training for that purpose, and I am in accord with the views of the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad of that, Mr. President. I know the position of the Senator, but I wanted it on record here, because I want to meet the Senator upon that level ground of agreement and base my argument upon that agreement. If we need 5,000,000 men, if the conditions demand 5,000,000 men, and if we can produce the material, equipment, and the shipping to transport those 5,000,000 men, then I know the Senator will agree with me that we ought to bring the Army up to that number. I have therefore prepared an amendment that will correspond with every argument which has been made upon the floor of the Senate, an amendment which declares that we will, at least we will attempt to, do it, and that declaration will operate as an incentive to realize the purpose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator will remember that when the first draft army was raised the Government was not prepared to take care of the young men who were called into the cantonments and camps. It was the result of the lack of preparation, let the responsibility be where it may. I do not undertake to say now where that responsibility was; but the Senator will remember that those young men were taken down there without their winter clothing, without hospital facilities, without the sanitary conveniences which would protect the health of the young men. The result was that about eight in every thousand, probably a little larger per cent, died.

I am influenced, as I said yesterday, by the statement of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff that if we were to arrange to organize an army of 5,000,000 men to-day we would send them into these cantonments unprepared again, and they would suffer the same inconveniences, and there would be the same number of deaths that happened in the last draft.

Now, then, if we were prepared to-day to raise 5,000,000 men I would act upon my own judgment rather than upon the judgment of anybody else, but I assume that the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff know how many men we can care for.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if I were advocating the raising of an army of 5,000,000 men without attempting to support the argument which goes with it that we must produce the equipment and the shipping to take care of those 5,000,000 men I would consider my argument as of no avail and a waste of time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator can show that I know it will be gratifying to the country, but the Senator knows that having undertaken to mobilize the industrial life of this country as fast as it has been possible to mobilize it, extending the plants at the expense of immense appropriations, we are still unable and will not be able, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] said yesterday, to equip our fighting forces with the ordnance necessary on the front, and we are not able now, I will say to the Senator, to equip 5,000,000 men with the necessary clothing and other things and put the men in cantonments and keep them in a good, healthy condition.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can show how it can be done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to hear it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Whether or not we will take hold and do it is another proposition. That brings me right up to the principal thing that I want to talk about. So far the raising of an army has been conducted solely by the executive department. The Constitution of the United States imposes upon Congress the duty to raise and equip armies and to provide for a navy. I want the Senator to help me get the Senate back into its own clothes. I want him to assist in the resumption of the legislative functions of this body. I know of no one to whom I can better appeal than to the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of this war committee.

Mr. President, the report of the House Committee on Military Affairs adopted by the Senate committee in this bill declares that this appropriation provides during the next fiscal year for an army of practically 3,000,000 men. To-day? No. Six months from now? No; but more than a year from now we are to have 3,000,000 men; it may be a million and a half in France and another million and a half training. Does the Senator mean to tell me that after one year or more this great Nation of 105,000,000 industrious people can not put over a million and a half into France? Is it therefore to be published to the American people and to the world that we propose to have an army of only 3,000,000 men in France by July 1, 1919? No; not 3,000,000 fighting men; 3,000,000 men, 66 per cent of whom only are fighting men. That does not mean 3,000,000 fighting men by that time, but that we expect to have in training in the United States and in France, including noncombatants, July 1, 1919, 3,000,000 men, perhaps one-half of whom will be in the United States.

Mr. President, how many people in the United States know just what fighting force on the western line this bill contemplates? Let us analyze it. The last public utterance made by the Secretary of War on the subject was that we have transported 800,000 troops. That was about a week ago. I think Gen. March in his testimony says that that is now increased to about 900,000. The testimony before the Military Committee declares that but 58 per cent of the 800,000 men belong to the fighting units. Therefore—and this, I think, will startle the American people, who are reading headlines about a million soldiers in France—instead of having 800,000 we had at that time 464,000 fighting soldiers in France. There is a vast difference between that and a million. The other units were composed of mechanics, foresters, lumbermen, railway contractors, laborers, and so forth.

Now, I join most earnestly with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in his declaration that we ought to give the truth in all its ugliness to the American people. If we had at that time but 464,000 fighting men in France, we ought to say so and not publish that we have about a million soldiers in France.

Mr. President, it being admitted, both officially and unofficially, that our allies are outnumbered on the European battle line, vastly outnumbered on the northern section of that line, and that the ability to recoup losses, because of the far greater population of the enemy, is greater than that of our allies, it must be apparent to everyone that we must look entirely to this country to maintain the equilibrium and if possible to throw the weight of numbers on our side. Are we doing our part?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I believe the Senator has given more attention to the subject of our shipping than any other Senator in this body. I will ask the Senator, based upon the knowledge he has as to shipping, assuming we had 5,000,000 men now in training and wanted to transport them to France, does he think for a moment that we could transport even half of them? Particularly if Great Britain on the 31st day of July and France on the 31st day of July, when their shipping arrangement ceases with the Government, withdrew their assistance, does the Senator think, in the condition in which our shipping is now, we could get them over there?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, Great Britain and France are going to afford every possible assistance to this Government in getting our troops over to France. If they could give us the requisite shipping during the next two or three months, so that with our combined shipping we could send 200,000 a month across the ocean to France, then, based on the department's assertion, made over and over again, that by August 1 the production of ships will be greater than the destruction of ships, there is every presumption in the world that we should be able to continue putting our soldiers across the Atlantic at the rate of 200,000 a month. That is not all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me answer further. You are assuming that with the present program of shipping you can take care of 3,000,000 soldiers. All right. Then there will be 2,000,000 more to take care of if you increase the number from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. Two million more soldiers would, according to my estimate, take not less than 10,000,000 more tons of shipping. That 10,000,000 tons can be produced this year in concrete ships in addition to the ships that we are producing and will produce of steel and wood, and we can have them ready if we can overcome the everlasting conspiracy now afloat in this country to prevent the construction of concrete ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not kept in very close touch with the concrete-shipping question, but I have noticed that one concrete ship has made a successful voyage, and I had supposed that that would probably settle the question of the advisability of building those ships. I will ask the Senator if we have not made an appropriation of $50,000,000, or something like that, for concrete ships?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; concrete shipping is hedged about, and the Shipping Board will not take hold of it on a large scale unless Congress especially authorizes it and directs it. The House committee refuse to direct it because they say that the Shipping Board can go ahead if they want to. The Shipping Board says, "We know we can, but we want instruction to go ahead," and the House committee says, "We will not give you any instruction." Now, I am not blind to what is back of that "you first."

Mr. GALLINGER. I am, and for that reason I asked the question. I supposed, having made the appropriation, we had discharged our duty, and I presumed that an executive department would not hold up a matter of that kind after Congress had legislated.

Mr. McCUMBER. Congress has not made specific legislation on the subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has it not made an appropriation?

Mr. McCUMBER. It has not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. McCUMBER. Congress made an appropriation generally last year for shipping, and will make another appropriation; but the Shipping Board says, "We want you to speak specifically; tell us to go ahead and do so and so in reference to concrete ships." The committee, through its chairman, answered, and I have the letter. "We gave you enough money, now take the responsibility." The Shipping Board says, "We will not take it," and there we are hung up between the two propositions—"You have the general authority" and "We want specific authority."

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess I have been laboring under a misapprehension. I had an impression that a direct appropriation had been made for the construction of concrete ships.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has not.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it has not, I was laboring under a wrong impression. Now, concerning the matter of ships, which the Senator has been discussing——

Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GUION in the chair). To whom does the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am yielding first to the Senator from New Hampshire, who has the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I very decidedly sympathize with that view. I notice in this morning's paper that notwithstanding the destruction of ships by submarines is very greatly lessened, yet for the last week more ships were destroyed than had been added to the tonnage of the world, and I think the situation is a very serious one.

Mr. McCUMBER. It certainly is, Mr. President; and it certainly calls for every possible effort on our part to secure as great a tonnage as possible. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not hear all the Senator's suggestion with reference to the concrete-ship situation, but I want to call his attention to a fact with which he may be familiar. Since the House refused to provide a specific appropriation for concrete-ship building, the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation has decided to establish five concrete-ship yards in the United States and to carry on the construction of concrete ships out of the general appropriation in those five yards.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but does the Senator stop to think what tonnage those five yards will produce?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not saying anything of that kind. I think they ought to be enlarged myself.

Mr. McCUMBER. I make the point that it is not a drop in the bucket.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I appreciate that, but I wanted to bring out the fact that the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation seems now to realize it, and are ready to use that money for the building of concrete ships.

Mr. McCUMBER. To use a little of it. They say, "We will use a little in experimentation, but we do not want to go to work on a large scale unless Congress tells us to do so."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know whether they have taken that position now or not, but they are taking the position that they will not establish more than five yards. I know that because I tried to get them to establish another one and they say they will not do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. They ought to establish at least 20 yards instead of 5.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator and I agree on that proposition.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if he knows whether Mr. Hurley has changed his views in respect to the building of concrete ships. The reason why I inquire is this: A short time ago I saw a publication to the effect that he is unalterably opposed to embarking upon the building of concrete ships. I was wondering if he had changed his mind and had reached the conclusion that there is merit in ships of that character.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not, of course, speak for Mr. Hurley, although I have had some talk with him that I would not repeat. I do not think Mr. Hurley himself has changed his mind, but the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation, of which he is chairman at present and only one member, has decided to locate five yards, under a suggestion probably from outside sources.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will if I have time this afternoon go in detail into the concrete-shipping proposition, but I had not intended to deal with it except generally. However, before we adjourn or take a recess I think I shall take occasion to lay the situation before the Senate.

Mr. President, our Military Establishment points with pride to the fact that with the assistance of British and French shipping we have been able to transport 200,000 men per month. And, considering the shortage in world shipping and the extraordinary burden borne by British maritime resources, it is a wonderful achievement. But this number, great as it is, is less than the monthly loss of our allies. They lose more than 200,000 a month.

From March 21, the beginning of the German drive against the British, to June 21, the close of the German drive against the French and Italian lines, our allies lost in prisoners alone about 225,000, and these were all from the fighting units, not from the noncombatants.

And, Mr. President, after the subsidence of the first exhilaration inhaled from exaggerated statements of enemy losses, and we began to count the losses of our allies, we are reluctantly forced to the conclusion that, exclusive of prisoners, their losses have been about equal to those which they inflicted upon the enemy.

That is nothing strange, but is a condition which we might very naturally expect when our allies are subjected to the deadly fire of superior artillery, the deadlier fumes of more poisonous gases, and the onrush of overwhelming numbers.

Therefore it is fair to assume that the disparity of numbers, great as it was prior to March 21, has not been materially changed by our addition of about 120,000 fighting men per month, and the advantages of war, notwithstanding the cheerful news of the failure of the Austrian drive, are still with the enemy.

We should do better than is contemplated in this bill, and I say this with all earnestness and sincerity to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not mean to say that if we do not do more it necessarily spells disaster to our cause, but our failure to do so will unquestionably prolong the war for many months, if not years, with ever greater slaughter and added horrors. To preserve these lives, to diminish these horrors, to bring this war to a close in the shortest possible time, it is our moral duty to do more if we can do it. And, Mr. President, we can do it.

We are continually asserting that the American people have not yet begun to realize that we are in actual war. But why should this tardiness of the American mind elicit comment, when neither the Congress itself as a whole, nor the War Department, nor the Shipping Board, nor other kindred boards have yet fully awakened to that realization? Certainly Congress must admit either that it does not realize the full importance of this war or that while conscious of its gravity and immensity it has nevertheless transferred congressional functions and responsibilities pertaining to the war to another branch of the Government.

I wish to plead with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to recall the constitutional functions and to exercise the war powers of Congress. Is he in the least degree uncertain as to where rests the authority to conduct and direct this war, whether in the legislative or in the executive department?

The Constitution creating this Government imposes on the Congress the duty to declare war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy. And, Mr. President, the sole authority to declare war, to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy, per se, imposes upon Congress the sole duty to determine the size and character of any army or navy created by it.

Certainly the chairman of this war committee will agree with me upon that declaration. Therefore it is for Congress to exercise legislative judgment as to the number of fighting men necessary to achieve a victory. Congress has no right, legal or moral, to relieve itself of or to shift that burden upon the shoulders of another, whether he be the Secretary of War or the President of the United States.

Mr. President, so far—and I think the chairman of this war committee will agree with me—Congress has wholly failed to assume that duty or to exercise any judgment whatever in relation to it. So far all Congress has done has been to enact whatever revenue measures or other legislation the executive departments have seen fit to recommend; to make appropriations as per executive schedule; and has exercised only a moiety of its judgment, even upon these subjects.

Congress, upon whom is laid the duty to raise armies—and I want the attention of the Senator from Oregon——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am trying to follow the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know the Senator is, and I am pausing while his attention is being diverted.

I want to say that Congress—let me repeat it to the Senator—upon whom is laid the duty to raise armies, has not once asked itself, How large an army do we need to make a success of this war; what tonnage of ships will it require to support that army? Congress has not once asked itself those questions since we entered this war.

I appreciate the fact, Mr. President, that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is a very busy man at this moment——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator from North Dakota will not undertake to get it into the RECORD that I am inattentive to his speech or inattentive to my duty.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, sir; I am referring entirely to many Senators who are engaging the attention of the chairman of the committee while I am trying to engage his attention at the same time. I know that he is so courteous that he tries to listen to three or four Senators at the same time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As the Senator from North Dakota has acted as chairman of committees, he knows how many questions are put to a chairman in the course of the day, and I try to answer all such questions.

Mr. McCUMBER. I appreciate fully the situation.

I now ask these questions of the Committee on Military Affairs, and if the judgment of that committee is that we really should have 5,000,000 men on the battle front by July 1, 1919, then why should we not so declare, that the executive branch of the Government may begin now to carry that legislative judgment into effect?

To expedite and better digest needed legislation on these subjects the Senate has constituted the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Commerce. So far what have these great committees done to enlighten the Senate on these subjects—that is, the subjects of war—or to initiate any legislation intended to carry the war powers of Congress into effect?

The Committee on Military Affairs does a little scolding now and then, I admit, because we have not any aeroplanes, but has that august committee ever exercised any judgment as to how many such machines we need? It has evidenced some displeasure, Mr. President, that some $640,000,000 of appropriations for aeroplanes have shown no concrete results, but has it ever suggested to any department when and how those machines could be secured?

It was the right and the duty of that committee to direct—and that is the point I want to make to the chairman of the committee—it was the right under the Constitution and the duty of that committee to direct, and not be the mere recipient of a direction. Like other committees, it has been the servant and not the master; instead of giving orders, like other committees it has simply obeyed orders.

Mr. President, had this committee recognized and upheld the constitutional authority and duty of Congress in the conduct of war, and then proceeded to perform the functions of a war committee, the skeleton of our aeroplane scandal would not now be grinning at the American people from its darkened closet. Had the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, with his great experience as a legislator and his vast fund of information upon the subject, directed the construction of aeroplanes, taken charge, and assumed the responsibility, we never would have had the aeroplane farce that is now shaming us.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator insists upon my remaining and listening to a lecture being delivered to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs for his inefficiency and inattention to business——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator can not accuse me of that. I am referring to the committees of the Senate, including the Committee on Military Affairs, and the only criticism that I will urge is a criticism against Congress and not against the committees, because they are the creatures of Congress, and Congress abdicated its authority and left nothing for the committees to do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will permit me for a moment, the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, which, as the Senator says, is but the servant of the Senate, has been vigilant and attentive to its business ever since the war began. I will say to the Senator, further, that the chairman of that committee prepared a universal military-training bill in advance of the action of the Senate, and insisted upon its passage three years ago. Was the Senator himself active in undertaking to get that bill before the committee? That bill is pending now. And not only that, Mr. President, but every war measure that has been introduced in the Senate and every war measure that has been adopted for the purpose of strengthening the Army of the United States has gone to the Military Committee and been promptly reported out. If there is delay somewhere, the Senator ought rather to blame Congress than the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will listen to me through, he will see where the blame lies. That is why I am saying, Mr. President, that if the Senator from Oregon could have control of the situation we would have had a different result. It is not his fault because Congress has surrendered its authority.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to have the Senator say that, because I rather construed what the Senator said as a criticism upon the chairman of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the contrary, I was paying the committee the highest compliment for their ability to do things, if Congress had allowed them to do them and had insisted that the power should rest in those committees, and had followed the advice of those committees, rather than some clerk in an executive department. I say had the committee—and this is another committee—had the Committee on Commerce been active in the performance of war functions which Congress of itself took away from them, had it enacted its judgment into positive legislation with direct and certain purpose, we would not have been a year or two years behind time in meeting the submarine ravages; we would not have lost six or eight months before we did anything toward improving our shipping situation.

I repeat, Mr. President, that these are not criticisms aimed at either of these committees, but rather at Congress itself, which, by its own legislation, has seemed overwilling to surrender its functions and delegate its authority, and thereby escape its responsibilities. There is where the fault lies.

Mr. President, in the light of our dereliction and of our total failure to shoulder our great constitutional obligations in this war, would it be impertinent for me to ask the Senate, even to plead with the Senate, to return to its ancient functions, to exercise its old rights and obligations given it in trust by our fathers? Would it be possible for me to secure the earnest attention of this body on the subject of what can we—the Congress, not the Executive—do and what ought we to do to win this war and to win it speedily?

I know that some of my colleagues, and I am afraid that most of them, will say, "We must leave that to the Secretary of War." Why leave it to the Secretary of War, may I ask? Admitting that he is a splendid lawyer, admitting that he is a splendid man, as we all will admit, is he a military genius? Has he had any military training whatsoever? Has he had any experience superior to that of the majority of Senators on the Committee on Military Affairs? Has he had the military training and the military information that is now in the possession of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs? Has he ever demonstrated a special aptitude on military needs and strategy that would make his judgment as to the force necessary to secure a victory on the western front superior to that of the committee and superior to that of all the Congress? Has he in his possession any knowledge that can not equally be obtained by the Committee on Military Affairs? If not, then why should we neglect our official duty? Why should we delegate our constitutional authority?

Other Senators say: "We must leave all this to the judgment of the President of the United States."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator for me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not at all. I am glad to be interrupted.

Mr. FALL. In listening to the Senator's remarks I was reminded of a letter written by Abraham Lincoln to Gen. McClellan during a crisis in the history of this country, in which Lincoln stated, with reference to certain military matters connected with the organization of the Army, that he had consulted every military man in the service in Washington before taking his action and that he had read every book on military tactics which he was able to obtain. Has the Senator any information leading him to believe that the Secretary of War or the Commander in Chief has pursued such a course with reference to this matter?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it would be impossible, with the many other duties imposed upon the administration at this time, so much greater than in those days, it would be impossible for any one human mind to understand everything on every subject; and therefore I have more confidence in 435 Congressmen and 96 Senators than I have in any one man in the whole world, or any 10 men.

But, you say, we must leave all this to the judgment of the President of the United States. Through what process of reasoning do you arrive at that conclusion? Certainly not from anything contained in the Constitution. The Constitution makes the President the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Is there not a clear distinction between the military and strategic judgment of a commander in governing and directing whatever force may be at his disposal in the field and the legislative judgment of Congress, which measures the importance and strength of the several warring nations, their man power, their resources, their territorial, industrial, or commercial advantages, and upon those data determines what force must be raised to meet the situation?

What are the duties of the Commander in Chief? They are to direct the movement of troops and to control the appointment of all underofficers. The commander is the soldier to execute the war. He is not made the legislator to declare war or to create and support armies. Had it been otherwise intended, our fathers would have created an autocracy and not a Republic.

Under the Constitution what is the clear duty of Congress in this war? Why, Mr. President, it is simple. It is to obey the Constitution; it is to assume the obligation imposed upon it by the Constitution; it is to exercise the war functions imposed upon it; it is to perform those duties in conjunction with the duties of the President of the United States, in harmony with him as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy; it is to furnish the Commander in Chief with an army sufficient in number to make short work of this war; and on the question of the number required it is for Congress to exercise its own legislative judgment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is not any question about the position that the Senator takes now. I do not differ from him at all in regard to any of the principles that he is laying down, but let me ask the Senator this question:

Take the Department of the Interior. Whenever a matter affecting the public domain is before Congress does not the Senator think it is very proper and very appropriate to call the officials there who have come in touch with the subject and to be governed measurably at least by their statement as to the facts?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. It is expert testimony, and I will give it all the weight of expert testimony; but when it came down to the question of exercising judgment I would exercise my judgment as a legislator, and right here let me call the attention of the Senator to the difference. On the question of how to move these armies, how to perform the functions of the Executive, we have no right to have anything to say. But does not the Senator know just as much about the population and resources of the German and Austrian and Bulgarian and Turkish Empires as the Secretary of War could possibly know? Therefore in measuring the strength of the armies of the enemy, in determining what we must oppose against these armies, is not our judgment as good as his?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but I was leading up to this question that I wanted to ask the Senator. Let me further illustrate it: When the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, who is supposed to be an expert, and other men connected with the War Department who are supposed to be experts and who are supposed to know the actual situation in this country as to their ability to handle and transport troops, come before the committee and testify, does not the Senator think that they ought to be treated as any other witnesses, and that the committee, in forming its judgment, ought to give some attention to the statements they make?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think they should be treated with greater concern than other witnesses.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say to the Senator that I have not surrendered my judgment, and I do not think any member of the committee has surrendered his judgment. The fact is, I believe I can safely say that the majority of the committee believe in a very much larger army; but the committee, after hearing the testimony that was given before it, without surrendering its judgment at all, felt that under the circumstances and facts as stated we would not be able at this time in this country to handle the men that it is now insisted we should have.

Mr. McCUMBER. On at least a dozen bills I have voted to surrender my own judgment to the judgment of executive departments, as the Senator has and everyone has; and I think that, in many respects—not in all—we have made great errors in so doing.

Now, Mr. President, I say upon the question of the required number that the thoughtful conclusion of 500 representatives of the United States rather than the conclusion of a single man, though that man be the Secretary of War or the Commander himself, ought to govern. If we believe that the Commander needs at his disposal more than he asks for, more than this bill provides for, we should be honest enough with ourselves to say so.

If we believe that we need 5,000,000 soldiers, 5,000,000 fighting men in France to win the war, we ought to say that we believe it now. If the bill provides for only about a million and a half in France in over a year from now, we ought to say to the country that our legislative judgment is that it is not sufficient. That is what I am pleading for. We ought to tell the people the truth, and then we ought to begin immediately to raise the required number and equip them in the shortest possible time. We can not do impossibilities, of course, but we can do our utmost; and when I say 5,000,000 soldiers I do not mean 5,000,000 men, only 60 per cent of whom are soldiers and the other 40 per cent are foresters or lumbermen or railroad builders or laborers. This battle is going to be won by blood and steel upon the battle front, in the trenches, and over the trenches, and there is where we need our force; and, Mr. President, the men who think we can win this war with less than 5,000,000 fighting men in the field have failed entirely to recognize the man power, the resources, the physical advantages of our enemies and the many disadvantages which we, as well as our allies, must overcome.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] presented in strong terms these advantages of our enemies and disadvantages of our allies, but he did not cover them all. May I briefly reiterate a few of these important ones? Here are some of the most important advantages of our enemies:

As suggested by the Senator from Missouri and as given by me on the 16th day of January, the population of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey are very much greater than the populations of France, Great Britain, Italy, and Ireland. Other things being equal, the central powers can place and maintain in the field from their excess of population about 5,000,000 more men than the entente powers of Europe can possibly put into the field.

Again, the populations of all the territories invaded by the central powers—Belgium, Roumania, Serbia, a large portion of Russia, and northern France—men, women, and children, are all made slaves, and under the military lash of the war lord are now producing to the last limit of physical strength for the central powers.

Again, between four and five million prisoners, now treated worse than slaves, are laboring in Germany to produce war material to destroy their own brothers.

Again, this compulsory service by civilians and prisoners alike releases other milions to bear arms for the German cause, thereby further increasing the superior number of the fighting forces of the common enemy.

Again, the physical and financial resources of the countries invaded, all of their property, all of their banks, have been seized and utilized by the central powers.

Again, the territory occupied by the central powers is vastly superior in productivity, acre for acre, to that of the entente powers.

Again, the central powers are in possession of all of the important oil fields, all of the important coal fields, all of the important iron fields, and now all of the important wheat fields, of Europe.

The Senator from Missouri yesterday gave in square miles the area of each one of these great contending countries, and showed the vast superiority of the central powers in extent of territory, and he might well have added that, acre for acre, the productivity of the central powers is far in excess of the productivity of the other powers unless it be France.

Again, not a foot of the territory of the central powers has been devastated or is under enemy control. Their industries have been untouched; and those industries, Mr. President, are organized as those of no other country.

Again, the central powers are one solid, contiguous territory, with both flanks of their battle line resting against inviolate neutral territory—Holland on the north and Switzerland on the south. Their transportation facilities are such as to enable them to throw a preponderating force, and, if they choose, an overwhelming force, against any point in this line in a few hours, while it would take days to move a like force from one section of the allied line to another to meet the thrust.

Again, in addition to the imposition of slavery on all the inhabitants of conquered territories, the central powers are exacting a tribute from those unhappy peoples more cruel than was ever imposed during the darkest periods of medieval warfare. I am informed that the per capita levy upon the Belgian people amounts to-day to $500 per annum.

Again, every product necessary to support the armies of the central powers is being produced but a short distance back of the lines.

Without any sea commerce to defend, the central powers, with their vast schools of submarines, are threatening the lives of opposing nations which must depend upon sea commerce for their existence.

Again, the cost of maintaining the central forces is extremely light compared with the expense of maintaining an equivalent force against them.

These are but a few of the enormous advantages of our enemies. As against these advantages, which in the aggregate become enormous in favor of the enemy, let us place some of the disadvantages against which our allies must labor. What are they?

First, the great bulk of all the food for all our allies must be transported from all portions of the earth, across seas infested by the cowardly and treacherous submarine.

Again, all material for clothing, drugs, medicines, munitions, oils, and lumber must for the most part traverse equally long and dangerous routes.

Again, immense numbers of warships, torpedo destroyers, submarine chasers, must be utilized to convoy merchant ships.

Great Britain must use a very large proportion of her man power in manning ships, both war and merchant, and in producing munitions for her allies, which places her at a further disadvantage in man power.

Again, the cost of maintaining the war on the part of the allies is not only much more but many times greater than the expense of maintaining an equally efficient war by the central powers, and the allies just to that extent are weighted down, overburdened in the conflict.

Mr. President, it has been declared on this floor that to put an army into the field in France will cost the United States $12 to where it costs Germany $1 per man.

Again, the heavy losses sustained by the allies on the western front in the March and May drives by the Germans evidences the inability of the allies, which I have already mentioned, to bring up reenforcements to meet the overwhelming numbers which the central powers can hurl against any given point; and what is more, possibly the saddest of all, in the invention of marvelous guns and of insidious gases, and in the utilization of new and more deadly instruments of war, the allies, including ourselves, are but tardy, inefficient followers, and never, I regret to say, originators.

Mr. President, in the face of these enormous advantages held by our enemy, in the face of these undisputed disadvantages of our allies, can any thoughtful, patriotic student of this war fail to comprehend that we can not hope to balance the inequalities with less than 5,000,000 fighting men or throw the balance of power in our favor with less than 7,000,000?

Mr. President, in an address on the 16th day of January of this year, I had the temerity to suggest that we ought to put 5,000,000 men into the field in the shortest possible time; that it would require at least 5,000,000 on the western battle front to balance the opposing forces and hold the enemy in check, and that we should need 7,000,000 before we could force that enemy out of the territory now held by him; in other words, before we could become the successful aggressors.

The New York World, ever alert with its white enamel to cover our war delinquencies and to call to task those who dare call for greater war endeavor, spoke of this suggestion of 5,000,000 men as a huge joke. The fact that two ex-Presidents shortly thereafter declared their conviction along the same line did not seem to convince this journal of the seriousness of the assertion, and I asume the ludicrous view of such a suggestion remained impressed upon that great journal, at least, until the President of the United States himself in one of his speeches asked, "Why stop at 5,000,000?" This huge joke then began to materialize into a real thing and the press of the country began to awaken to the fact that it had been dreaming. The western drive, which had already given the enemy nearly 200,000 prisoners, about 2,000 great guns, and 4,000 or 5,000 machine guns, besides hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of army equipment, the immense trains after trains of such equipment, which forced the allied lines to retreat more than 30 miles, has emphasized the demand for at least 5,000,000 men, and demonstrated its necessity.

I hope that that great journal to-day, if it shall see fit to give publication to the utterances of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] quoted here in favor of the five-million policy, will not put it under the heading of "Gloomy Reed" or "Gloomy Wadsworth."

I, however, confess, Mr. President, that I do not know just what the President of the United States meant when he said, "Why stop at 5,000,000?" If I had made that declaration, it would signify that I did not deem 5,000,000 sufficient. And so when I ask the President or the Secretary of War or whoever is responsible for the 3,000,000 Army program of this bill, Why do you stop at 3,000,000 men, not more than two-thirds or three-fourths of whom are to be fighting men, as evidenced by the bill which the House has reported and which I assume represents your views, I mean to convey a conviction that this bill ought to provide for more than 3,000,000 men. I know what I mean when I say that any budget which contemplates less than 5,000,000 before June 30, 1919, is playing at war and not making war.

Mr. President, I can not understand the absolute complacency of the Secretary of War in the face of recent disaster after disaster on the western front. Prior to May 21, 1918, the press of the country was loud in its braggadocio that the western line of the allies could never be moved or broken. I did my bit, however feeble in results, to demonstrate that our allies were vastly outnumbered on the western front and that on account of the advantages in geographical situation of the enemy they could throw an overwhelming mass against any sector and crush it before reenforcements from other sections of the allied lines could be had, and, Mr. President, that is just what did happen. Therefore if I am asked why do you exercise your judgment for 5,000,000 when the Secretary of War suggests only 3,000,000 I will answer that my prophecy of the disaster that happened upon the western front has come true and his prophecy has failed.

Notwithstanding the fact that some of our optimistic Senators who had visited the front declared that the British line could never be broken, that line was broken and forced back about 30 miles in three days. And so successful was the assault, so overwhelming the number of assailants, so superior in artillery and in new gas shells, that the allies lost more than 250,000, including nearly 100,000 prisoners, in three days, and more than 1,000 heavy guns and more than 2,500 field guns, with an immense store of supplies, supply trains, ammunition, and equipment.

Our Secretary of War then visited the front, and upon his return, with complacent smile, he reported that all was well and perfectly safe. It really seems strange to me that the press and the Secretary of War seem to be the only ones imbued with these optimistic ideas of the invulnerability of the allied lines. Every other man who studies the situation feels that this line without substantial assistance from us can not possibly withstand the German pressure now that they are able to withdraw all their soldiers that were used upon the Russian front.

This complacent attitude of the Secretary of War had its immediate influence on the press of the country. That press began again to declare that the allies could not be driven back any farther. It declared the appointment of Gen. Foch assured allied victory. No one could give any special reason why Gen. Foch could do any more or any better than Gen. Haig was able to do. But forgetting the ancient rule of success, "Say little and do much," we resumed our boasting and continued our leisurely habits. We read fairy stories of the wonderful reserve forces which the allies had in the rear, and each day the press of the country predicted a counterstroke which would crush the enemy. No one who had given thought to the situation believed in this counterstroke except the press and possibly the complacent Secretary of War. As a matter of fact, there have been no considerable number of reserves.

Every man acquainted with the facts knows it, and what is the use of attempting to dupe the American people upon that reserve proposition?

No one believes that Gen. Haig would have lost 90,000 prisoners, a thousand large guns, and 2,500 field guns, with hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of equipment, in three days, if he had had a reserve force or any force that he could have defended them with. No one in his right mind can still think that Gen. Foch has a reserve force that can strike back when he loses in prisoners alone more than 75,000 in about five days and an equipment almost as great as that of the British loss.

No, Mr. President; the reserve force lies in the soldiery of the United States, and we might as well recognize it now and prepare to place it where it can make the promised counterstroke.

Mr. President, criticism for criticism's sake only is in itself a sort of disloyalty. Constructive criticism is patriotic. I seek by this argument and the amendment to construct an army sufficient to accomplish our war aims—victory and an honorable peace—and to accomplish this in the least possible time, with the least possible sacrifice in lives which is dependent upon that time, and I feel that I ought to have the support of the committee and of the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I am pleading that Congress shall no longer stand idly by and allow this exaggerated halo of optimism to blind its eyes or the eyes of the allies; I am pleading that Congress shall now resume its constitutional function, that of raising and equipping an army; that Congress should go on record as saying it is not satisfied that 3,000,000 men are sufficient; that Congress should say: "We have investigated this subject and we are certain that the situation demands before the close of the fiscal year 1919 an army of at least 5,000,000 men in France." Is there a single Senator who will now deny that we shall need that force in France before we get through with this war?

But I hear Senators here say, "We haven't the ships, we haven't the equipment, to transport and support 5,000,000 men by that time." It is true we have not the ships to-day. It is, furthermore, true that if we continue in the inefficient, dilatory manner which has characterized our proceeding thus far we can not produce the ships. But it is equally true that we have the material, we have the man power, we have the mills, we have the ability to meet this ship requirement, and more than meet it, if we just will to meet it.

So, Mr. President, a day or two ago I quoted for the Senate a statement from Amsterdam to the effect that the German submarines in the month of May had accounted for 614,000 gross tons of the world's tonnage. The next day the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] called my attention to this statement and stated to the Senate that he was surprised at the statement; that he had submitted the matter to our Navy Department and that they had given him the figures for all of May up to the 28th, and that the actual sinkings at that time were 233,639 gross tons, and, carrying the estimate for the other three days, it would make a total of about 258,671 tons; and we were assured that this, coming from the Navy Department, was the last word upon the subject and was actually accurate and we could depend upon it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator give me the name of the official who furnished that information from the Navy Department? Was it the Secretary or Assistant Secretary or who was the man?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Kentucky does not state. He says:

> I took occasion to inquire this morning at the Navy Department, and was informed that the total losses for the month of May, with the exception of the last three days, for which figures had not yet been compiled, were 233,639 gross tons. Now, if the average for those 28 days in May was carried out for the last three days, that would make a total of about 258,671 tons.

He does not say from what one in the Navy Department it came, but I naturally assume that it came from the one having charge of that investigation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If there is a discrepancy of that magnitude between two hundred and odd thousand tons and six hundred and odd thousand tons and the Senator from Kentucky has had information from the Navy Department, the Senator from Kentucky will be asked to give the information later.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I can partially explain a part of the discrepancy.

The report from Amsterdam which was quoted gives gross tons. It gives the sinkings at 614,000 gross tons. My opinion is that that was a mistake, and inasmuch as the German authorities always report in dead-weight tonnage the use of the word "gross" tons was a misnomer, and it really means dead-weight tonnage. If we reduce that to dead-weight tonnage and then take the last available figures upon the same subject we will find that the discrepancy is practically wiped out.

But what I want to call attention to is that it was declared that these figures were authentic, and yet two days later we get the publication from the British Admiralty showing the losses during the month of May, and this is what they say: They say that during the month of May the British losses were 224,735 tons, or almost up to what was declared to be the total tonnage by our Navy Department according to the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky. They also stated that the allied shipping sunk—and this, of course, means not only by submarines but by the ordinary marine disasters in the shape of mines, collisions, and so forth, was 130,950 tons. That was the allied and neutral shipping sunk, or a total of 355,694 tons. We have our Navy report with three days of the month estimated at 258,671 gross tonnage, and the British reported 355,694 gross tonnage, an increase of almost 50 per cent more than our own Navy Department placed it at. It goes to verify what I have stated right along that we seem to persist in the habit of minimizing our disasters and magnifying our successes. Of course, the Navy Department intend to be accurate, but the information somehow seems to get colored before it reaches the department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Has the Senator figured what would be that amount in dead-weight tonnage?

Mr. McCUMBER. Multiply gross tonnage by 1.60 you get it dead-weight tonnage. Some multiply gross tonnage by 1.50.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It makes nearly 600,000 tons for the month of May?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and that will compare very closely, you will see, with the German estimates if we substitute gross tonnage for the dead-weight tonnage in this report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We must consider that in the reports of what we are getting out ourselves our figures are given in dead-weight tons.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but in this instance they are given in gross tons. The figures quoted by the Senator from Kentucky are given in gross tons, and not in dead-weight tons, as we are in the habit of doing.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Upon the output?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; he was discussing the sinkings.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to call the attention of the Senator and the country to the fact that when we talk about the great output we are having that is given in dead-weight tons, and we must compare that with the 600,000 tons lost instead of 350,000 tons.

Mr. McCUMBER. When we speak of sinkings we always speak in gross tons.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. And when we speak of construction we speak in dead-weight tonnage, and that misleads the American people.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I want to emphasize.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the Senator able to advise as to whether or not the German military authorities usually give these losses in dead-weight tons or in gross tons?

Mr. McCUMBER. They give it in dead-weight tons, and that is the reason, as I stated, why I think the dispatch which gave 614,000 tons as the German sinkings, according to their claim, in gross tons was a mistake, and it should have read dead-weight tons. Then, if you use dead-weight tons and take the British Admiralty report, you will find there is very little difference between them, so that in reality when we talk of producing 3,000,000 dead-weight tons by January we have accounted for nearly 1,000,000 of it in the month of May in losses.

Mr. President, I do not know whether I ought to go into the subject as to where we can get our ships. I have taken so much of the time of Senators that I would prefer to give that in another address, because I want to go quite thoroughly into it. But I want to say right here, and I want to say it with all the earnestness in my power, that we can produce 10,000,000 tons dead-weight between this day and the 1st day of January next in concrete ships that will take our soldiers safely across the ocean if we have a mind to do it. I can go ahead and show that we will produce it.

I know there are a great many Senators who have more or less prejudice against this matter of concrete ships, who seem to think that some one who has some Portland cement to sell is wanting to find a market for it. The cost of Portland cement would not be a drop in the bucket in the matter of the construction of a concrete ship. It is not worthy of consideration at all.

I know also that a great many other Senators look at our sidewalks with their many cracks and say, "How can you build a ship out of material of that kind?" They do not stop to think that these sidewalks are built under a contract system and with lack of a sufficient quantity of Portland cement. They do not stop to think that the greatest piers to-day in the world are concrete piers. They do not stop to consider that after the great earthquake in San Francisco, when they began to consider the safest kind of a structure, they concluded that the structure which would stand vibration better than anything else would be a concrete structure. They forget that all the great buildings which are now constructed throughout the United States are either partially or wholly concrete. They forget that the longest railroad bridges in the United States and in the world are now constructed of concrete.

Mr. President, as from the very beginning of this war the vital question was ship production, so to-day the great, the vital, question remains ship production.

Can we with some assistance from Great Britain put afloat sufficient tonnage to enable us to maintain an army of 5,000,000 men by June 30, 1919? We can if we will it.

Mr. President, I leave the question of the production of steel and wooden ships to the constructive ability and energy of Mr. Schwab and his Shipping Board associates. I know about what tonnage will be produced by this board, and I know when the results are measured by the imperative needs of the country we shall be greatly in arrears.

I feel confident that had this country on the 7th day of April, 1917, said to any American with the ability and experience of Mr. Schwab, as it said to Mr. Goethals when he began the construction of the Panama Canal, "Here is all the money you can use; proceed immediately to construct the greatest amount of tonnage the country is capable of producing in 1917 and 1918," we would have had sufficient tonnage to maintain an army of 5,000,000 in France before January 1, 1919.

But we failed to grasp the seriousness of the U-boat ravages or the demand that would be made upon us for more men at the front. So to-day, while we all recognize the necessity at this very moment of an army of 5,000,000 men, we have provided in this bill for an army of but 3,000,000, and that not by January 1, but by July, 1919, probably not more than one-half of whom are to be upon the fighting line in France by that date, more than a year hence.

Without question we could increase the Army to 5,000,000 by July 1, 1919, and these 2,000,000 more than this bill provides for could be placed on the battle line if we could secure the shipping. What shipping in addition to the present program would be required? My estimate, which is somewhat above the War Department estimate, is that it would require at least 10,000,000 additional gross tons of shipping to maintain these 2,000,000 additional soldiers. These 10,000,000 tons additional can easily be constructed if we will proceed to construct concrete ships on a large scale, on a scale commensurate with the needs of the country.

Mr. President, I am in doubt whether or not I ought now to take the time, when I believe that the Senate is in a hurry to get a vote upon this measure, to go into the details of what we can do in the direction of constructing concrete ships. I will ask that the Senate accept my word, so far as my judgment is accurate, that I can point out to the Senate unquestionably where we can get 10,000,000 extra tons of shipping; and that will be sufficient. I want to quote the first declaration made, after one year's close study of this subject by the Shipping Board, upon the statement made to them by their chief engineer, who had given all his time to this investigation. He starts out with this declaration:

(1) The reinforced concrete ship can be built structurally equal to any steel ship.

Now, I leave you to dream over that for a little while.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator from North Dakota any recent information as to the serviceability of the ship known as Faith, which is, as I understand, a concrete vessel?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me give the second finding:

(2) The available information—

And this declaration was made before certain ships which were then under construction had been put to the test—

The available information assures with all the certainty possible, short of actual experience under service conditions, that the concrete ship will be durable for several years, assuring satisfactory service throughout the probable duration of the war.

And that is what we want.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from North Dakota know whether or not the manufacturers and producers of steel, whether in the fabricated or in the unfinished form, or any other agencies are opposed to the use of concrete for the building of ships?

Mr. McCUMBER. I know some are. Do not let me be understood as saying that the great steel companies, and so forth, are opposed to the use of concrete in the building of ships; no one has yet made one single statement contrary to the declaration made in this report that the concrete ship can be made a success, and that while the steel hull costs us from $140 to $200 per ton, the ship Faith, including its ways, cost but $28 per ton.

Mr. KING. Then, does the Senator know what is the objection urged to the construction of additional ships of the character which he is describing?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think there are certain propagandists in the United States to-day that do not wish to see this country go extensively into the construction of concrete ships; they hope that we shall somehow worry through this war without calling extensively upon our ability to construct concrete ships, and that when the war is over we shall have a sufficient number of steel and wooden ships to supply the shipping demand and shall not need the others. I will furnish some evidence along that line, I think, at some future time.

Now, Mr. President, I want to quote but one thing further on this line. I got this telegram concerning the Faith, which was a ship of something over 5,000 dead-weight tons, constructed in San Francisco by private parties, upon their faith in concrete. It was not built as strongly as the Government engineer thinks such ships should be built; but, nevertheless, here is the telegram:

Concrete steamer Faith, six days out of San Francisco with full cargo, reached Seattle yesterday afternoon on her way to Vancouver after one of roughest coast voyages recorded; 80-mile gale; waves 35 feet high; everything in perfect condition. Captain and Government officials aboard expressed themselves as follows: "Faith acted as any other good ship of wood or steel, and with absolutely no vibration."

Vibration becomes an important feature.

But, Mr. President, it is urged that if we put 5,000,000 men in the field immediately we should draw so heavily upon our industrial army that we shall not be able to supply the fighting army.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Am I rightly informed when I say that the United States Shipping Board has already let contracts for a certain number of concrete ships?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; for a very few.

Mr. POMERENE. For how many?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, I think 30 or 40, probably. Most of them are little ships, to be used to bring oil up from Mexico to the United States for the use of our ships.

Mr. POMERENE. The concrete ship Faith, about which the Senator from North Dakota told us a minute ago, was launched only a few weeks ago, as I understand?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. And it is the first concrete ship which has been built and launched, as I understand?

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, others have been built by other countries.

Mr. POMERENE. But it is the first large ship of that kind which has been built in this country, in any event?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; one was launched a short time before that—I think in Montreal—which was found to meet every requirement.

Mr. POMERENE. I have every faith that such ships will prove satisfactory; but I think the Shipping Board may be excused for not giving very large contracts until a little later.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, I want the ships to get our men over. War is a gamble; we have got to take some chances. Every engineer in the United States says he can see no reason why concrete ships shall not be a success. We have tried them and they have proven a success. Then, why hesitate longer? It is vital to the interest of our cause that we get our men over. It will save thousands and thousands of lives of our brave boys if we get them over in time. We owe it to our soldiers upon the battle front that we allow no mercenary motives of any class of people in the United States to influence us against the performance of this most sacred duty.

Mr. President, the idea that we shall not be able to supply a fighting army, to me, is nonsensical and can only be predicated upon the assumption that the industrial army will not or can not be made to perform its duty, an assumption which I shall not consider for a single moment. Scotland, with a population of about 5,000,000, has put into the field since the beginning of the war about 900,000 men. At the same ratio this country could put into the field 18,900,000. Scotland maintains her quota at about 700,000. At the same ratio we could maintain 14,700,000. England proper, with a population of about 35,000,000, maintains 4,530,000 in the field. At the same ratio the United States could maintain an army of 13,590,000, or nearly 14,000,000. In other words, to maintain an army of 5,000,000 we would have to withdraw from our industrial force only one-third the proportion that England is compelled to withdraw from her industrial force to secure the same result; and England must import her raw material and must utilize her industrial force in the importation.

Mr. President, England does this while laboring under the additional handicap of furnishing all the shipping for her allies, much of the ammunition, all the warships necessary to control the surface of the seas, and even troopships and convoys for the United States.

Mr. President, with our man power we are not to-day accomplishing one-half of what we could accomplish industrially. The waste of man power along every line of war work is shockingly prodigal. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is loaded with illustrations of our reckless extravagance of man power.

But, Mr. President, in addition to this criminal waste, there are millions upon millions of men in the United States capable of performing some character of service who to-day are consuming the products of American industry without performing a stroke of work to replenish the stock.

I have never had a very high regard for the Ku-Klux Klan of the South, but I must confess a degree of admiration for them when I read of their parading through the streets bearing standards reading, "Get into the workshops or into the trenches."

Now, let Congress say to all of the manhood of this country, "Get into the workshops or on the farms and do a man's work or get into the trenches," and we shall have no difficulty in supplying our Army.

Mr. President, from the very beginning of this war we have been flirting, and are still flirting, with slackers. France was compelled to put her own citizens, every man who could bear arms, into the field. That left her without farm labor. Germany and the other central powers did the same, but Germany secures her labor and maintains her industrial equilibrium we may need their labor. Provision could be made for the reritories. France was compelled to provide for oriental laborers, and I am informed that she has given employment to more than 250,000 Chinese laborers. We should put 5,000,000 men into the Army at once, and if that is found to draw too heavily upon our industrial force we should supplement it by 500,000 or 1,000,000 orientals, if necessary, to labor in our fields and factories. They would come only as hired individuals to do work that is necessary.

To-day we say, "You can not come in," no matter how badly we may need their labor. Provision could be made for the return of everyone to his native country at the close of this war, so that labor conditions would not be disturbed. That would be conducting war on a business basis and not playing with it as we are doing now. Victory, complete and overwhelming victory, is so vitally important to the world and to this country that sentiment against alien labor or yellow labor ought to be thrown to the winds. We need the men in the field and at the battle front, and if that would weaken our supply in the productive field, then we should get the supply force from whatever available source. If China had 5,000,000 tons of shipping and we could purchase it to-day would we not do so? If China has 5,000,000 tons of energy which can be utilized for our benefit in carrying on this war, should we not purchase that also? Of course, we would not want to keep these Orientals in this country after the war. We can not assimilate the yellow race, and we do not want another color problem on our hands. But it is just as legitimate, just as practicable, and just as patriotic that we should purchase the labor of China during this war to be employed in our fields or factories as it would be to purchase the product of that labor in China. If, as I say, we need more men on the battle line than can be spared from our industrial requirements there is left to us but one patriotic duty—put the necessary men in the field and supply the deficit from whatever source obtainable.

Mr. President, Mr. Harry A. Wise Wood, in a little pamphlet entitled "Trifling with the War," has presented this feature of our weakness so tersely and so emphatically that I shall quote his words. I ask the Secretary to read them for me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

> Our people are not organized for a successful war. Labor, capital, and fighting men are three essentials of victory. Fighting men and capital are being conscripted; the latter by means of taxation, the regulation of prices, transportation, and fuel, and the taking over of many of capital's chief properties. But labor is not being conscripted.
>
> In making and operating a war machine, capital furnishes the plant, fighting men the cutting edge, and labor, whether of mind or hand, its motive power. But of these essentials we compel only two to serve, while labor—an absolutely indispensable element—remains upon a purely voluntary basis.
>
> This is a wrong against military efficiency and justice. To leave the functioning of any necessary part of the war machine of a nation, in the hour of its peril, subject solely to the inclination or whim of any body of its citizens is to endanger the working of the whole machine, and to lay open to defeat the very cause for which it exists.
>
> Of two brothers, one within and the other beyond the draft age, the younger very properly is compelled to leave his home and associates, to give up his comforts and his career, and to risk his life for his country. But the other is compelled to make no such sacrifice, nor any sacrifice whatever, notwithstanding that his work may be as essential as is his brother's to the safety of the Nation. He may enter a shipyard or munition factory and get double wages, and there be free to lay off or to work as he pleases, or to quit if he likes. He may strike for higher wages, or with impunity play off one employer on Government work against another for higher pay. Such a man may serve his country or not as he wishes, in the way he wishes, at what price he wishes, and with such privileges as please him, and no one may lay a hand upon his shoulder and compel him to do a stroke of work for his brother whose life is in jeopardy, or for his country whose liberties are at stake. Still, for practicing any one of the derelictions of duty which are this man's daily privilege, his brother could and should be imprisoned or shot.
> Here we see clearly our greatest single weakness, a weakness for which there is no remedy save one—to register every male of industrial age under a compulsory industrial service act, and to draft and uniform those who are needed to fill the ranks, executive, technical, clerical, or labor, of the industrial portion of our Military Establishment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Iowa stated to me that he would like to have me point out the way wherein we could increase our industrial efficiency to meet the demands that would be occasioned by increasing our Army to 5,000,000 men. I regret that the Senator is not present to hear read the statement of Mr. Wood; but, Mr. President, I wish to read into the RECORD here a portion of a letter from the Ridgway Brick Co. to the conference committee on national preparedness, which shows in a clear, concise way the real labor conditions to-day in many of our industries. It does not apply all over this country, but it does apply to many sections.

I called attention the other day to the fact that the Government, through the Post Office Department, was sending out all over the agricultural sections of the country notices which were to be posted and which invited laborers to come to the cities and get $4.40 per day, and that, too, for the lowest character of labor—unskilled labor. At the same time other notices were sent out asking the farmers to produce all the wheat they could possibly produce; in other words, calling the laborer from the farm to secure these extraordinary wages, so that the farmer could not produce, and then asking him to go ahead and produce for the benefit of the country and to save the Nation in this war. That labor policy has been followed out from the very beginning of this contest.

Mr. President, let me quote a little from this letter from Ridgway, Pa. It seeks of this conference committee on national preparedness a solution of a great labor problem. It says:

At Milton, Pa., there is a large plant making shells for both the United States Government and the allies. There are also at Milton two other large plants that are making material necessary for the prosecution of the war. Just above Milton there is a large brick plant making chemical brick which is necessary for the various acid plants, and 3 miles above this we are attempting to run a clay-working plant where we are making a material used in the Government warehouses, hospitals, and, in fact, numerous buildings that are being erected directly for war-purpose work.

All of these plants are bidding against each other for labor, with the result that the wage scale goes up, but there is no more labor in the community as the result of the high wage scale; but inefficiency does result, for the reason that a man will quit one plant to-day and loaf two or three days before going to work at the other plant, and his reply is, invariably, that "he is making so much money that he can afford to loaf a few days."

Again, he says:

A similar trouble exists in the mining operations throughout the bituminous region. The miners throughout the western part of Pennsylvania are making so much money that they feel that four days a week are enough to work, and there seems to be no patriotism in the proposition whatever.

That possibly needs to be answered to some extent. I do not think many of the American people realize that a large part of this class of labor that is being discussed here are not Americans at all. Probably 50 per cent of them can not speak English and probably 90 per cent of them are foreign born. So we are not dealing in this instance with the old American laborer, and it is not surprising that, being foreigners, they do not have the same active, earnest interest in our war that you and I naturally would have, and that we would expect of an American citizen.

Again, the letter says:

Operators are compelled, in order to run their mines at all, to either grant bonuses or pay wages greatly in excess of the prices established at Washington. A man will decide that he is tired of working in one mine and wants to go to another, but in the meantime he thinks he will take a week or 10 days off, and when he does this he persuades his cronies, whether they leave the place they are working or not, to take two or three days off with him, and this naturally reduces the production materially.

This is a condition which can be corrected, and eventually must be corrected as our labor becomes more and more curtailed; but it seems to me the time for action is now, not after we find ourselves so seriously handicapped that it will take us months to make up for our shortsightedness.

We delayed three years getting ready for the war, and if we delay six months in finding some solution to the above-named troubles we are going to handicap the Nation very seriously indeed.

I sometimes fear that while these conditions are recognized they are not recognized to their full value, for the reason that they are not directly under the noses of the officials at Washington, and they only see in a small way the effect of these conditions.

A very wise move would be to have some broad-minded business men investigate conditions such as named above and report on them for the purpose of getting some definite action.

Now, remember that this is addressed to the conference committee on national preparedness. That committee then sent out an investigator, and this is his report:

Mr. Owens is interested in a coal mine in the Brockway district. He tells me that miners employed by his company—the Brockway Mining Co.—work only from 7 a. m. to 2.30 or 3 p. m. and then cease work for the day. They do not work at all on Saturday afternoon, and, largely on account of excessive drinking, mine operators expect little, if any, work to be performed on Monday, many of the miners not going to their work at all on that day. In consequence mine operators have come to look for only four working days per week—Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, the work on those days ending at 2.30 or 3 p. m., as stated. Working even at this rate the miners receive from $40 to $57 per week, as was indicated by the company's pay roll.

The coal miners are paid at the rate of $1.75 per ton and are able to earn easily, in the hours mentioned, enough money to satisfy them. It appears from my inquiries that they have little interest in the war and no adequate interest in the welfare of those who have gone from their communities to serve in the Army or the Navy.

I was informed also that miners stay away from their work for trivial reasons—that recently in the Brockway district there was a christening attended by feasting, which took the time and attention of so many men that the production of that district fell off at least 500 tons during the week of the christening.

To summarize my conclusions:

Important war work is expected from the district under consideration.

There is a shortage of labor in the district.

The shortage of labor has given rise to profiteering by the workmen, who let themselves out to the highest bidder, thus artificially raising wages out of all proportion to the value of the work done.

This artificial wage scale reduces the number of days and hours that the men are willing to work and lessens the care and intensity of their labor, thus depreciating the quality of their effort while lessening its output.

The situation, so far as the Nation is concerned, is harmed by the auctioning of labor, which permits one employer to take men from another employer, and its consequences of inefficiency, loss of time, and unwarranted increase of wages, which latter merely adds to the power of thoughtless men to put money and energy that are needed for the war into nonessential and luxurious things, which in turn absorb other effort and capital that should be exclusively devoted to war work.

So it appears that in these districts the Nation itself, in its method of dealing with labor, has demoralized the labor market and labor wages, so that only about four days' service is secured in a week, which means a loss of 33⅓ per cent of production capacity; and that 33⅓ per cent, if utilized, would take care of our munitions, would build our ships, and would provide for our Army of 5,000,000 men.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not catch the name of the author of the statement or report from which the Senator was reading.

Mr. McCUMBER. The report comes from the Conference Committee on National Preparedness. That is an incorporated company. It is signed by James E. Clark, secretary of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was very much struck by the reason given for the failure of the workmen to report on Monday.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there it is in a nutshell. We have the material, we have the mills, we have the men. All you have to do is to combine them in six honest days of labor a week, and you have solved your problem. Is that a national matter? You take your boy and put him on the front, and you say: "You have got to work for $30 a month, and put your life at stake, and you have got to work 24 hours in the day, in mud up to your neck, if we demand it." And yet the Nation is afraid to say to these men, receiving these enormous wages: "You shall work six days a week, and you shall work eight hours a day, for what you receive."

Let them have the $4.40 a day for unskilled labor and from $7 to $10 per day for skilled labor; but, for Heaven's sake, exact an honest day's work in return. Exact it for the honor of your country, for the success of this war, for the lives of our soldiers. Conscript the manhood of the United States. Conscript the womanhood of the United States. Great Britain was as unprepared as this country for any character of a military campaign when she entered this war. She brought all her raw materials from abroad, and she accomplished wonders in less than a year.

We have a population three times as great as England. We have resources ten times as great. We have the energy. We have the men. Let us utilize them, and we will not be lagging in this war. It is not a conscription of labor; it is a conscription of the manhood of the country—a manhood that ought, by every principle of patriotism, to conscript itself.

Mr. President, I can not close this argument without a short presentation of another element of our weakness in this war which we ought to proceed immediately to overcome. The Washington Post of Sunday, June 2, gives an account of the war view of Gen. March, expressed to members of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. I especially quote these words from the statement of Gen. March:

"There was no effort here to disguise the fact that the success of the German blow up to this time has been a surprise. Apparently new elements of strategy have been employed which forced the withdrawal of the French on an unexpected scale."

Gen. March explained to the Senators that long-range fire with gas shells had played a part in the German strategy. The French positions miles in the rear of their front lines were repeatedly drenched with toxic shells of large caliber and rendered untenable even before the enemy infantry had approached them, necessitating wide retirements.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is that an interview with Gen. March after he left the committee room?

Mr. McCUMBER. The last that I am quoting is from the paper itself.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not remember any of that testimony before the committee. That is the reason why I am asking the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator will find it there—not in the same words, of course.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am speaking now of the hearing that we had with him a few days ago before the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. This was in the Washington Post of June 2, so it was long before that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Very well; I misapprehended the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, Mr. President, why is it that these surprises are all on the side of the allies? It comes from British military authorities that the great success of the enemy drive which began March 21 was due to the fact that the British were taken by surprise. In the second great drive the French are taken by surprise. Why is it that the Germans are never surprised? The answer is not a difficult one. They are the aggressors. They strike when and where they will. It is the Germans who always evolve new elements of strategy. It is the Germans who always take advance steps in the production of more effective artillery. It is the Germans who always invent more deadly gases. Are they more intelligent than Americans? They certainly are not. They may be more thorough and methodical, but for real inventive genius they are far behind the American people. In times of peace we are the inventors, and the Germans have utilized our inventions for the most effective war weapons. Why is it, then, in this contest of annihilating the enemy or being annihilated that we are followers and not leaders?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. With reference to the use of deadly gases, I read the other day a mere newspaper statement that the allies had recently invented a gas that was much more deadly than anything that had been used during the war by any of the armies. I do not know whether that has escaped the Senator's attention or not, and it may not be a fact.

Mr. McCUMBER. I read in 1914 that the allies had discovered a means of capturing every U-boat, and that the U-boat menace would be a thing of the past. I have read it every month ever since, but it has not happened. I am afraid the same result will follow in this case. If we have invented it, we have not seen the effect of it. We have not used it. That is dead certain.

Now, why are we simply following our enemies in the line of new instrumentalities and new ideas, and not leading them? If it is possible to create a gas that will destroy all life in its path, the Germans will soonor or later discover it. If Germany were as near the wheat fields of Great Britain or the United States as we are able to get to her own grain fields, she would find gases that would burn up every acre of grain. If, so far, Germany has not used gases that would destroy every living thing in the great cities over which her Zeppelins and her flying squadrons range, it has been because, so far, she has failed to produce the deadly gas. Certainly it is not because of any sentiment of humanity or of lack of industry. She may produce it before this war is over. I do not know. And by the time she wipes out every living thing in Paris and London and other large cities by this necromancy of chemistry, we will begin to imitate her, but it will be too late. The reason we are mere followers and not the advance guard in new elements of warfare is the old reluctance of both Army and Navy for new ideas and the determination to keep out anything that is not evolved by themselves. The following excerpt from the press of a few days ago is exceedingly pertinent. It reads:

> Why do you read that Germany has developed and is using a gun that fires nearly a hundred miles?
> The answer is that when a German approaches his Government with the idea that he can make a gun to fire a hundred miles the Government shows an interest in him. He is not told by an office boy to see another office boy. In Germany the man came along, as probably 20 men have come along in the United States, and suggested a plan for building a new kind of cannon. The Government tried it, and Paris, unfortunately, sees the result. You will say that this is the greatest country for inventions and new ideas. Quite true. It is also the greatest country for Government indifference toward inventions and new ideas.

Why are not all of the great chemists of this country called together to-day, and why are they not studying this great problem with a view to securing the greatest possible instruments of destruction by gas or fire or anything that will meet the enemy on something like equal grounds? The Senator from New Hampshire, in his suggestion, indicates that they probably are. I think they have not been at work very long, because I have wonderful confidence in the American genius, and in the inventive power of our American people, and their ability to meet any situation.

Mr. President, in closing let me say that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] seemed to take my earnestness and zeal for an amendment to this bill, and my plea that we should resume our governmental functions, as a criticism upon him and upon his great committee. I hope the Senator from Oregon will not so construe my words, because I know of no Senator in the United States in whom I have greater confidence than the Senator from Oregon. I have seen his spirit of independence exemplified; I have seen his industry; I have confidence in his judgment. All I want is that the Congress shall join with him in resuming senatorial functions in the conduct of the war—and I do not mean executive functions, but our functions—take a greater interest and exercise a greater control over what is being done to raise an army. I hope that the Senator will allow this amendment to be adopted, which says to the American people, "We are looking with determined hope toward that period in the near future when we shall have 5,000,000 fighting men upon the battle front." Let us set our stake for this great endeavor, and with eye fixed and soul girded we shall not fail.

Mr. CURTIS, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. It is my purpose to detain the Senate for only about seven or eight minutes, and I hope the Senator from Illinois can wait until that time. Of course, if he has to go away, I will defer to him.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, of course I am very glad to defer to the Senator from Kansas, in view of the preliminary arrangement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Kansas proceeds with his address, may I express the hope to the Senator that we may dispose of this bill this afternoon and evening? The necessities of the War Department are extremely great; and unless we can finish it this afternoon, and have it submitted to the House to-morrow, it will postpone it beyond next week.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I will yield the floor, for the purpose of expediting the vote on this amendment, and take advantage of some other occasion to make the remarks I have in mind.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; I hope the Senator will finish.

Mr. CURTIS. I yield the floor, and I will take the 10 minutes on some other measure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator will not do that, because I understand he is only going to occupy a few minutes. I am only expressing the hope that after the Senator finishes we may be able to dispose of the bill to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Kansas will proceed with his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is hardly a man in this Chamber for whom I have a higher personal regard than the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I like him in every way except politically, and I would like him in that way if it were possible for a hidebound Mississippi Democrat to like a western Republican politically. But there are some things he has just said that I think I ought to resent as an American, as a southerner, as a descendant of people who fought for this country when this country's fate was at stake.

The Senator tells us that the Germans always surprise us. He unconsciously subscribes to the idea that the Germans are supermen of some sort or other. They have not surprised us at all. We have surprised them at every inch of the game. They were surprised to death because that hero, King Albert of Belgium, fought instead of letting their armies pass through. They were surprised to death that Great Britain was not a nation of shopkeepers, as Napoleon had said and as they had repeated, and that Great Britain went to the front in order to defend Belgian neutrality. They were surprised to death when Serbia fought, and when Serbia by herself whipped Austria by herself; and they were surprised to death when they found out that they could not kick America the fourth time without her fighting back. They did think they had surprised us when they sank the Lusitania and we did not fight. They thought, a little bit later on, that they had surprised us when six or seven men in this body voted against a declaration of the existence of a state of war which Germany had been carrying on for God knows how long. They thought they had surprised us when we did not dare expel those men from this body, but they did not surprise us anywhere.

Great Britain has her men in the field. Canada has hers. Australia has hers. The South Colonies have theirs. The United States have theirs. I am not afraid of these "supermen," because I know them here and abroad. They never were supermen and they are not supermen now. I have known them in Mississippi when they were fellow citizens of mine in Mississippi and have always found that they were slower and stupider than I was. I have known them in Germany as a student at Heidelberg, and I always found that they were slower and stupider than I was.

Why is the Senator trying to persuade us that we are guilty of being surprised by the Germans all the time? Why, if any race ever made an absolute ass of itself, the German race has, from the beginning of this war. They first thought that the Belgians were cowards and dared not resist a march across their territory.

Before that even the Serbians they thought would lie down like cravens and let the Austrians pass over them. Then, in the next place, they thought the Britons were going to do the same thing, and in the next place they thought that Canada and Australia and South Africa would not stand by Great Britain, but, on the contrary, would revolt. The only thing they have not been surprised about is the Irish or the Sinn Feiners in Galway. They can have all the credit they deserve for that. They even made a mistake about the real Irish in America and Great Britain and in Connaught and in Ulster. They can have the few fellows in Galway who are members of the Sinn Feiners and who are contending that they can see nothing but Ireland and think they are fighting for Irish liberty while they are fighting against the world's liberty.

How have the Germans proven that they have surprised anybody about anything? Oh, you say they went out with a great big gun that shot seventy-odd miles. I will tell you right now we have one that will shoot farther and shoot better, and shoot almost as accurately as a pistol.

Now and then they attach to themselves what the French or the English or the Americans or the Italians have discovered, like railroads and spinning jennies and locomotives and telegraphs and wireless, which everybody else discovered before they ever thought of them. Now and then they attach that to some sort of a war-making industry, because they are always thinking about killing, and we are civilized men and thinking about something else. But outside of their attachment to the inventions of the world for war-like and brutal and inhuman practices they stand nowhere.

I have not any particular use for any voice in America that even by innuendo admits that the German is a superman of some sort. I know him. I have known him in his own country, and I know him here. He is slow; he is stupid. It takes him a long time to catch on. After he catches on, of course, in accordance with his education of the last 40 years, he applies his knowledge to man-killing purposes. I do not apply mine to that, and you do not apply yours to that. That is the only excellence he has in the world; and, as sure as there is a God in heaven, who is the God of fatherhood, with an equality of brotherhood somewhere under Him, we are going to whip those Huns and those Goths and those Vandals, who are yet even worshiping the god of their forefathers and not worshiping the God of Christianity. Woden and Thor and Frei are their gods yet. I have no sympathy for any man who has stood in America as a critic of what we are trying to do.

"Oh," you say, "we did not do everything we could have done." Of course we did not. How could we when we believed in the humanity and fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man and civilization? Our minds were not running upon the idea of killing one another. How could we? All these little fellows who come into the Senate and into the House and out of the Senate and out of the House and in the country and the newspapers, here and elsewhere, who tell us how many specks there are upon the bright American sun—what have they got to do with it? What have we done?

Out of 100,000,000 people who knew no ideal except peace, who knew no ambition except to further peace, who knew no sentiment except love for mankind, we have, upon the necessity at the demand of brutes, made ourselves an Army and a Navy. We have a Navy which not only is the second best in the world but is very nearly first best right now, and which without the assistance of Great Britain could whip Germany on the seas to-morrow, and we have made of ourselves an Army which while it can not whip them to-morrow on land will be able to do it in six months.

It has not been many years ago since my forefathers fought this flag, but when they fought it they fought it for ideals that they thought were superior to the flag itself. They fought it for the very ideals we are now fighting for on the arena of the entire world.

I know Germans, I know Austrians, I know Hungarians. I know them here, and I know them abroad, and I tell you I have no patience with the infernal superstition that rather regards those as supermen whom we have got to kill. It reminds me of the state of public opinion which Lord Macaulay described as existing in Great Britain against the Spaniards in the fifteenth century. He said every Englishman's idea of a Spaniard was that he was part terrier and part demigod, but all they had to do was to meet the Spaniards, and when they met them, everywhere and every time, the Spaniards were overcome.

Does not the Senator from Oregon know Germans in his State? I know them in Mississippi. Does not the Senator from North Dakota know them out there? Have we ever found anything superior about them either in intellect or in courage or in moral character?

Now, I am not contending that we are supermen. We are not. We never have contended that we were. But I am tired of this constant talk about the Germans taking us by surprise. The only people in God's world they have ever taken by surprise were themselves. They were surprised when Belgium fought and surprised when Serbia fought. They were surprised when Britain came in. They were surprised when Ireland did not prove traitor instead of Galway. They were surprised when India did not revolt. They were surprised when Canada came to the front. They were surprised when Australia and New Zealand came to the front. They were surprised finally, to our humiliation, when we dared fight.

I pin my faith to Woodrow Wilson and to David Lloyd George. I do not believe that in the entire German Empire, produced by the science and provocative German education of 30 years, they have produced anyone who can claim to be of God's chosen race or is anywhere near the equal of either one of those two men.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The Senator from Connecticut suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Gulon	Martin	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Hale	Nelson	Smoot
Calder	Henderson	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sutherland
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Thomas
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Thompson
Cummins	Kendrick	Penrose	Trammell
Curtis	Kenyon	Poindexter	Underwood
Dillingham	King	Ransdell	Vardaman
Fall	Kirby	Robinson	Wadsworth
Fernald	Knox	Shafroth	Warren
Fletcher	Lenroot	Sheppard	Watson
France	Lewis	Shields	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Simmons	Williams
Gallinger	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.
Gronna	McNary	Smith, Md.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I rise to announce the absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], occasioned by his personal illness. I ask to have this remain as an announcement for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the question before the Senate now is the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and I ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. FRANCE. I have submitted an amendment and I ask if it is not now in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that this is the parliamentary situation. Originally the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] introduced an amendment fixing the age limit at 18 to 45. To that the Senator from Maryland offered an amendment. Subsequently the Senator from New Mexico changed his amendment to the ages of 20 and 40 to agree with the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. That leaves the amendment of the Senator from Maryland wholly inapplicable to the amendment now pending.

Mr. FRANCE. I think the Chair is in error about my amendment, because I subsequently offered the amendment in a modified form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When did the Senator offer it?

Mr. FRANCE. Immediately after the Senator from New Mexico perfected his amendment, at the very close of the session on the calendar day of the 25th.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "thirty-one," the last word in the proposed amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], insert: "but those between the ages of 19 and 21, exclusive, shall be called for education or training, nonmilitary, military, or both, or for other forms of noncombatant national service during a portion or all of each year."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me ask the Senator from Maryland if he has not inadvertently used the wrong word there? As the Secretary read it, it reads "between the ages of 19 and 21, exclusive."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the way it reads. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry for information. Is the amendment now a proposal to amend the law by fixing the draft age between 20 and 40?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is as modified.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment.

Mr. FRANCE. There must be some misunderstanding as to the ages which I have mentioned. I have used the term "19 and 21, exclusive," which, of course, means that at the age of 20 years the registrant shall be liable for military training. So the amendment does not carry the extension of the age below the age of 20.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HARDWICK. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico by striking out the word "twenty" where it occurs therein and substituting in lieu thereof the word "twenty-one."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to strike out "20" and insert "21."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word or two in support of the amendment. I have been very much impressed with the argument made on the proposition of the Senator from New Mexico, and personally I shall be very glad to vote for it if the age is not, for the present at least, carried below the limit of 21. I think we ought to stop for a while—and I am inclined to think forever—at 21, the age when manhood's responsibilities and rights begin. I do think, however, that the age limit ought to be raised, and shall vote for 45 years or 40 years or whatever other figure is proposed.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have not taken any time to discuss this question because so much has been taken by other Senators, and I know the desirability of passing the bill in the shortest possible time; but the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia is, in my judgment, directly contrary to what is best for the military service. What we should do is to create as efficient an army as possible, and we should reduce the age limit for taking men into the service instead of increasing it. There is no military man who will not say that a man between 20 and 21 is a better soldier or will make a better soldier than a man between 21 and 31, and infinitely better than a man at 35, and so much better than a man at 40 that there is no comparison between them. As has been frequently said, the Civil War was fought by very young men—very largely by men under 21. We have five veterans in this Chamber, whose average age when they went into the service was 18, and they all performed distinguished service during the war.

If we are going to make any change in the age limit, we should certainly go down one or two years rather than increase the age to any material extent. If it were considered desirable to reduce the age to 20 and increase it to 35, I do not think we would greatly weaken the average value of the men in the service, but if we increase the age over 30 to 40 or from 30 to 45 we are certainly going to weaken the strength of our service, based on the number of men in it.

I hope that the step will not be taken until it is very carefully considered and we have all the evidence the War Department can furnish on the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I suppose it will be generally admitted that I have never been engaged in any general criticism of the War Department or of the administration or of America during this war. I suppose it will be very generally admitted that I have tried to do the very best I could to keep in accord with departmental and administrative ideas, because I thought as a rule they knew more about it than I did. But upon this particular matter I am sorry to say that what has been lately said by the Secretary of War, and if I understand properly by the President and by Gen. Crowder, does not meet with my approval. Of course that is no slur upon the administration. It may, upon the contrary, be quite a slur upon me.

But when I hear men say we have got men enough to fight a great war all over the world, my reply is you never have men enough unless you have all the men you can get. I remember how the South was fooled by the Battle of Bull Run. Everybody thought, of course, the Yankees had gone anyhow; that we did not need any more men; and even the Confederate administration took the view and recommended to the Confederate congress that we should not enact a new draft law just at that time, and they did not. As a consequence we found that that temporary victory at Bull Run became an ultimate defeat by its retroactive effect upon the South.

And that is not all. The North had exactly the same experience in various places and at various times. I want to say right now that you never have man power enough to win a great world war until you have got all the man power that you can decently and properly arrive at. I say that you can draft men down to 20 and up to 40 without doing any harm to American industries, American agriculture, or American social life, and that we ought to do it now instead of waiting until later.

I am awfully sorry to differ with the President and with the Secretary of War and with the other men, but now and then, you know, a fellow has to do that even when he does not want to do it. I think we ought to concentrate all our energies upon winning this war, and we ought to do everything necessary to win it, and I believe that this is, if not necessary, at least advisable in order to win it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, as I understand the practical effect of the amendment, it leaves it entirely discretionary with the President as to whether these men shall be trained or not. In other words, when a man is in school I presume the President would take that into consideration and possibly have him trained during the recess or for three months prior to his reaching the age of 21, when automatically he would become subject to draft. That is the purpose of the amendment in leaving it at 20 years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND'S name was called). I desire the RECORD to show that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is absent from the Senate on account of illness in his family.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the Senator from Vermont and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. LODGE. I will ask if the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. LODGE. I have a general pair with that Senator, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote "nay."

Mr. COLT. Although I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (after having voted in the negative). In view of the fact that my vote in the negative on the pending question might be construed to the effect that I prefer the draft age of 20 to 21, I change my vote to "yea." I prefer the age of 21 to 20.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Ashurst	Johnson, S. Dak.	Robinson	Thomas
Bankhead	Jones, Wash.	Shafroth	Thompson
Borah	Kendrick	Sheppard	Trammell
Culberson	King	Shields	Underwood
Curtis	Kirby	Simmons	Vardaman
Gore	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.	Willey
Gronna	Martin	Smith, Md.
Hardwick	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Hollis	Pomerene	Sterling

NAYS—41.

Beckham	Gallinger	McNary	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Gulon	Nelson	Smoot
Chamberlain	Hale	New	Sutherland
Colt	Henderson	Nugent	Wadsworth
Cummins	Hitchcock	Overman	Warren
Dillingham	Johnson, Cal.	Penrose	Watson
Fall	Kenyon	Phelan	Weeks
Fernald	Knox	Pittman	Williams
Fletcher	Lenroot	Poindexter
France	Lewis	Ransdell
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sherman

NOT VOTING—22.

Baird	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Tillman
Calder	Kellogg	Page	Townsend
Gerry	La Follette	Reed	Walsh
Goff	Lodge	Saulsbury	Wolcott
Harding	McLean	Smith, Ga.
James	Myers	Swanson

So Mr. HARDWICK's amendment to Mr. FALL's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEEKS. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico by substituting the word "thirty-five" for the word "forty," where it occurs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico by way of a proviso.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment submitted by Mr. FALL the following proviso:

Provided, That those under the age of 21 years shall not be called for other than training service for such period or periods as the President shall prescribe until they have reached the age of 21.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a word in regard to this proposed amendment. I very well remember the discussion on the selective-draft law and the sentiment that then seemed to prevail in the Senate. I think it was a very general sentiment to the effect that, while boys under 21 years of age might volunteer and enlist in the Army through volunteering, yet it was unnecessary, and it was somewhat against a general sentiment throughout the country, that boys under 21 should be drafted into the military service. I think that that sentiment controlled when we passed the selective-service law. I confess that for one I share in that sentiment now.

I wish, Mr. President, that we might provide for every possible emergency or exigency; and I think we shall be fully able to do so by raising the age to 40 and without taking boys under 21 years of age to the firing line. There will be the one year between the time they are 20 and 21 in which they may have a period or periods of training as may be prescribed by the President. Those periods of training can be so fixed and prescribed by the President that the important and material industries of the country will not be seriously interfered with. They may be fixed, for example, so that the work on the farm will not seriously suffer. I think that we ought now to provide that those under 21 years of age shall not be taken into active military service. Some training must be had in any event before they are fit for active service.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has stated that it is within the discretion of the President to provide periods of training. I would rather this should not rest in the discretion of the Executive, but that Congress should here expressly provide that boys under 21 years of age shall be called into the service for training purposes only.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota is partly unnecessary and partly not so. It is partly unnecessary because during the necessary training periods, if a boy should be called only at 20, he would be in training, anyway, before he is sent to the front. That training may take three months, it may take six months, or it may take nine months, or whatever other time it may take. We have made very good lieutenants and captains out of many boys in the training camps in three months. Now, in so far as the amendment provides that the boys shall not go into active service until they have reached the age of 21, in view of the fact that they must have a training time, the amendment is useless. In so far as it goes beyond that, it is absolutely harmless.

We never would have won the American Revolution with that sort of a law. The South could not have fought two years with it. Of course, many of you think that would have been an immense advantage, but the North could not have fought to a finish with it either. The boys that are best fitted to fight, because they are most ambitious, are the boys who go into the service below that age—from 18 up to 21. Pretty nearly a plurality of the southern army during the late war was 16 years of age and a little bit above, and the northern army averaged, if I remember correctly, about 18 years, was it not, I will ask the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. From 18 to 22.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a rather broad margin, but the Southern Army was filled with boys from 16 to 17, and more gallant soldiers never stood anywhere on this earth while they fought against the immense material resources and equal courage of the North.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One second, Senator. Why not make the minimum age the same here as in Great Britain? That would avoid many embarrassing questions both here and in Great Britain. We have a treaty with Great Britain in connection with our citizens there and her subjects here, who are to serve here according to our draft age and our citizens there who are to serve there according to their draft age. If we make the draft age identical, we dispose of all those doubtful questions, and there can be no trouble about the service. Now I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Mississippi that three-fourths of the Army of the North during the Civil War were young men of from 18 to 19 years of age when they enlisted. Everybody who has had experience in war knows that a boy from 18 to 21 years of age can render better service, will be a better soldier, and can stand more hardships than one above that age, especially one above the age of 30.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that is not only true, and has not only been settled by the military authorities to be true, but it is also true that it is more to the interest of the Government to have those men before they are permanently entered into agriculture or into manufacture or into factories or into mining or into other such positions. A great many of them are schoolboys, and do not, therefore, have to give up any useful pursuit in life in order to become soldiers. That is not all. It is still more to the interest of the Government, because, as a rule, they have no dependents.

The cheaper you can fight a war, of course, the better for the Republic. You are not hunting around for the man who has a wife and four or five children; but, if possible, you are hunting for the man who has neither wife nor children, and that is generally the case with a boy under 21. Down South they frequently marry before they are 21, but up in the North and the East they very seldom do; and out in the West they less frequently do it than they do down South, so that there is every reason in the world why they should be subject to military duty.

I rather resent the idea that a boy owes nothing to his country until he has a right to vote. That seems to be upon a sort of equal footing with the idea that a woman owes nothing to her country unless she has a right to vote. I think that when the laws take care of a fellow personally and protect him in his property, in his liberty, in his limb, in his right to exist, and in his pursuit of happiness, even if he is only 20 years of age, he owes as much to the American Republic as if he were pretty nearly as old as I am. Of course, a fellow pretty nearly as old as I am owes more to the Republic, because he has been protected longer, but he can render less service. That is the God's honest truth. The boy can render more; so that when you want an intelligent, able soldier, with initiative, who is ready to go in and bear his part, and bear it nobly and well, the boy answers every condition of the problem much better than men of the age of the Senator from Minnesota and myself, because we have lost a good many of our illusions and ambitions and a good deal of our poetry, if not our patriotism, and neither of us would be quite as good a soldier as my boy who might respond at the age of 20, or your boy, or the boy of some one else. So I think we had just better keep the proposition as it now is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment offered by Mr. FALL, it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That all male persons who have attained the age of 20 years shall be registered and shall be subject to military training for a portion of the year in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, but shall not be called for active service until they have attained the age of 21 years.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, just a word on that amendment. Of course, all young men at 21 are subject to immediate call. The adoption of this amendment would simply prepare for service men 20 years of age before being called. That is all there is to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am afraid we are trifling with this whole matter. We are in a world war, but seem to be handling it with gloves instead of barehanded. If we are going to enlarge our forces, if we are going to bring this war to a close as fast as we can get the men across and equip them, we want the best army we can get; and the best army we can get is an army made up of men starting at 18 years old up to 35, or possibly 40 or even 45 years old.

It matters not if we provide to-day for the drafting of men between the ages of 20 and 35—we will get a handful of men—but after deducting those who must remain in the productive industries we will not get an army. If, however, we will start out right in the first place, we will have for the Army the young men to give the enthusiasm, the punch, and the go, and with them some of the older men at the same time, to give judgment and steadiness. Everybody knows that in every army, our own armies and the armies of other countries, the boys from 18 years up to 20 and 22 and 25 make the bravest and best soldiers. They are best of any to endure the tug of war.

So far as the amendment to the amendment is concerned, I shall vote against it, and so far as the amendment itself is concerned I shall vote against that, too, because, in my judgment, neither goes far enough. I shall be glad to vote for a bill that will provide for taking into the service men from 18 to 40 or 45; but to take a few men now and very soon have to enact another law is, in my opinion, not a good plan to follow.

As for putting an amendment on this bill amending the draft act and authorizing different ages, nothing shows better than the difference of opinion expressed in the Senate the past two days that we are not ready to meet this problem now. We may be ready soon.

We have got to consider the question of transportation—of shipping—which will soon be very short, probably. Unless we can renew existing contracts, as I understand, with our allies and others, on the first of the coming month, more than half of the shipping allotted to us will be out of commission, so far as we are concerned, for, as I understand, we have borrowed the shipping of other countries, which they need in providing support for their armies, food and other supplies, and to transport them. They are running down their reserves, and we are running on very light reserves in our Army over there, in order to push our men over as fast as possible. The movement of troops, I believe, has been at the rate of approximately, or nearly, 300,000 a month.

Now, if we are crippled in shipping, the question is whether it would be wise immediately to put in force another draft and go through the same unfortunate experience we did in the start. To undertake to put men in training where we have neither sufficient shelter nor clothing nor arms for them will make us no headway. We are proceeding each month now on a regular schedule for taking in new men. We have men enough in class 1 to carry us into January next. We shall be in session here either continuously or shall meet here again as early as September. We will know then about what shipping we will have; we will know how many men we will be able to transport; we will have an inventory in regard to our cantonments and posts; we will know how many men we can shelter, and we will by that time know how many we can clothe and fit out.

It seems to me that it is just as well to let this whole matter go over and let the committee take it up and later lay before the Senate a better digested and better thought out—or, at least, a later thought out—plan than that which has been presented.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. NEW addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming if he believes that the age limit of the men to be drafted should be from 18 to 40, why does he not prepare such an amendment and present it? I agree with his idea about that. I think men between 18 and 40 should be subject to draft. Now, why is it that, if such legislation were passed, it would be any detriment to carrying on the war? Why wait to know about shipping and other contingencies and uncertainties? Why not make it optional with the President, as the emergencies may develop overnight or from minute to minute, and put into operation such law as the Senator has indicated at the discretion of the President?

Mr. WARREN. I have not presented such a proposal myself because, upon the latest information we have received regarding supplies and so forth, I have thought it was fully as well to wait two or three months; and I have thought that this debate, which has all been for the best, and which has brought the question before the Members of the Senate and before the people of the country, would stabilize, if I may use that term, the situation, so that we may know what we want to enable us finally to arrive at victory. I have proposed to make the limit as low as 18 and as high, perhaps, as 45——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My question to the Senator is——

Mr. WARREN. Excuse me a moment—because the earnestness of the nations engaged in this war and the reports that we are going to get and, in fact, are getting show that this is a real war; it is not a mere distant commotion that is likely to subside very soon. We are a long way further from the finish of this war than we are from its beginning, and I have felt we would lose no time whatever by allowing this supply bill, that must go through or should go through by the 1st of July, to go through unencumbered by this proposal, and then take up this matter later on, debate it, and thrash it out to a finish.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am just as much in favor of stabilizing——

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that, if he would offer such an amendment as he has indicated, I would support it now or at any time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I agree with the Senator that that is what ought to be done; that is my opinion about it; but the Senator is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I am not; I pretend to no technical knowledge upon the subject at all, and I take the judgment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who has been chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and who has been a soldier, and the judgment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who has been a soldier, and the judgment of other military authorities upon that subject. I think that men as young as 18 make the best soldiers, and I think the draft age should be from 18 to at least 40, and I would have it higher if men past 40 were fit to render the kind of service that the country needs.

I am just as much in favor of stabilizing this question as is the Senator from Wyoming, and I think it can be stabilized right here and now if Senators are willing to stabilize it and fix it.

The Senator from Wyoming says, on the basis of the debate already had, we shall vote next September or October. Why not vote this afternoon? If the Senate thinks that 18 to 40 is the right age, that will stabilize the matter. The pending proposal does no compel the President or Gen. Crowder or the General Staff or the War Council or anybody else who has authority to withdraw these men at that age unless they want to do so. They can reclassify the whole body of men subject to draft; but it is for us to fix the age.

I disagree entirely with the statement, if I understood it correctly, made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] a day or two ago, that it was an Executive function to say how many men should be drawn or how large the Army should be. The Constitution of the United States says that the Congress of the United States shall raise and maintain armies. It is for us to fix the size of the Army, and the size of the Army should be based upon the great body of men subject to service, and then the President can draw to the limit. There are so many men in this country between the ages of 18 and 40, and if they are all subject to the draft that means that Congress decides that the Army may be the whole body of those men. Of course, no more will be drawn than the military emergencies demand.

Why can we not settle it this afternoon? What is the use of procrastinating about it? We have had all the debate on this question that can give any knowledge to anybody. The Committee on Military Affairs, or its subcommittee, has had the Provost Marshal General before it. We have had the views of the Secretary of War and the views of the President. I agree entirely with the views expressed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], who know something about this subject; but I do not see why we can not vote on this question within half an hour.

I do not care to make any further speech about the matter. I am satisfied that all the information that the Senate will get on this subject it now has in hand. I think the country would be much better satisfied—and I am sure I would—if we knew now what the draft age was to be; and I think the country is sa-titled to know, so as to make its preparations as far in advance as possible. If men are going to be drafted into the service of the United States and sent abroad, they are entitled to all the time they can have to arrange their affairs—family affairs and financial affairs and business affairs—and I do not see how any harm can come from the body whose constitutional duty it is to fix the size of the Army and the draft age fixing it now, stabilizing it, as the Senator from Wyoming says. It seems to me that now is the time to stabilize it. To flirt with it, to leave it uncertain, to take a recess for several months, on the theory that later on we will know something else that we do not know now, and leave the country in ignorance of its liabilities and obligations during our recess, is not wise policy.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has said most of what I had expected to say when I first asked for recognition, but I should like to add that I do not quite understand what the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] means when he says that he thinks we are trifling with this subject. This amendment of mine was certainly offered in as good faith as any amendment ever was offered.

The Senator from Wyoming says that he is in favor of taking men from 18 years up, because he thinks the soldier from 18 to 23, if I understood him correctly, is the best soldier in the world. I agree with that, and I certainly would vote for an amendment that would take the boys from 18 to 21, who are now excluded, believing, as he does, that they would make the best soldiers that are available.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I am sure the Senator and I are not at variance in our opinions as to this matter. I did not address my remarks especially to the Senator's amendment, but more to the general subject; and the Senator's amendment, in my opinion, like the others, does not go far enough.

Mr. NEW. I understand that; but, Mr. President, the effect of this amendment would be simply this: It would put in condition to be soldiers the boys who are now approaching the time when they must be soldiers, in or out of condition. Nobody knows just how badly we may need half a million or more extra men next year, but we will need them badly enough. This amendment, after allowance is made for all exemptions on account of physical disability, for dependency, or for other causes, would give us at least half a million men that we can not get under any other circumstances or from any other source.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be added to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed amendment it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the regulations relating to classifications and exemptions shall be so framed that there shall at all times be in civil employments a number of persons sufficient to produce enough to maintain, equip, and transport our military forces, support our civil population, and furnish to the countries cooperating with us in the war the supplies which their necessities demand. And all said regulations shall enforce, in so far as practicable, the duty of every qualified citizen either to labor in a useful way or bear arms in the defense of his country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico. As he has it now, as I understand, the draft age is fixed at from 20 to 40 years. I propose to strike out "20" and insert "18" as the minimum, and to leave 40 as it is, so that the draft age will be from 18 to 40.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On line 2 of the proposed amendment it is proposed to strike out "20" and insert "18."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have occupied very little of the time of the Senate in discussing this measure, but I am unalterably opposed to a reduction of the age at this particular time. If the hour arrives when it becomes necessary, I shall vote for it.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] spoke the other day with respect to the effect that the reduction of the age was going to have on the colleges. It would have the same effect upon every other young man in the country. We are not only interested in this war but we are interested in the things which are going to occur after the war, and we are particularly interested in having these young men given the opportunity to learn their trades and to get their education. The time when they can do this is between 18 and 21 rather than any other period.

I do not propose to take the time of the Senate further, but I wanted to make my position upon that question perfectly clear.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I hope we shall have a yea-and-nay vote upon this proposition to change the age to 18. There are a great many Senators who have expressed their conviction that the draft ought to include the boys 18 years of age. That is my conviction. I think that ought to be the standard for the beginning of enlistment, as well as the beginning of any kind of compulsory service, and I should like to have a yea-and-nay vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator will understand that there are many, perhaps, who will agree with his position that the minimum age of enlistment should be 18, but who, in the light of the attitude of the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and the Military Affairs Committee, will feel constrained to vote the other way. Does the Senator think that a yea-and-nay vote would truly reflect the views of the Senators upon that question?

Mr. McCUMBER. It might not. I hoped I would get the judgment of the Senate and not the judgment of anyone in the War Department. That is what I have been trying to talk about all day—the duty of the Congress to exercise its judgment upon that subject—and I wanted a conscientious vote upon the subject of the age.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does not the Senator think we ought to have the opinion of George Creel on this matter before we can vote? [Laughter.]

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we should have our own good judgment and the judgment of Senators who have spoken on it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by my colleague that he would like to have a record vote upon this amendment, I wish to say that while I am in favor of increasing the age limit, I am opposed to reducing it. For fear that some one might think there was something selfish in my attitude on this matter I will say that my boys who were below 21 have gone to the war, but I have another boy who is more than 30 years old. I am willing to raise the age limit, but I am opposed to lowering it below the age of 21.

If it were not for the fact that I know the Senate is anxious to take a vote this afternoon I should like to have something more to say upon this matter, but just in explanation of my vote on this amendment, I can not vote for it because I am opposed to reducing the age below 21, although I would be in favor of increasing it up to 40 or 45, and I so voted the last time this matter was before the Senate, a year ago.

Mr FALL. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that various Senators have expressed themselves as in favor of fixing the age at 18, I wish to say that I so expressed myself. Since that time I have perfected the amendment, after consultation with many of my colleagues, and have agreed to support the age of 20. I think the Senator will have ample opportunity to come to a vote on the question of fixing the age at 18 before we get through with this war.

Mr. McCUMBER. Allow me to say, Mr. President, that I do not think this amendment will be adopted; but I do think the vote on it ought to express the real views of Senators. I hope that those who believe it ought to be adopted will vote for it, and then, if it is not adopted, of course we will vote for the other.

Mr. FALL. I am not going to vote for it, Mr. President, and I make this statement as to the reason why I shall not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. McCUMBER. On that I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALDER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. As he is absent I withhold my vote. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made before, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent for the day. I am paired with him for the day. Some transfers were made on the other votes, but not on this; so I refrain from voting.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. By arrangement we have transferred our pairs, so that the Senator from Georgia stands paired with the Senator from Minnesota, and the Senator from North Carolina and I are at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT.] In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the last roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CALDER. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 64, as follows:

YEAS—9.

Brandegee	New	Sherman	Warren
McCumber	Penrose	Wadsworth	Weeks
Nelson

NAYS—64.

James	McLean	Swanson

So Mr. BRANDEGEE's amendment to the amendment of Mr. FALL was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. FALL. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this amendment now involves two propositions—one, the reduction of the age; the other, the increase of the age. I ask for a division of the question in order that we may have an expression of the Senate upon the two matters.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is such a division in order, in view of the fact that the Senate, as I recollect, has already voted against an amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] increasing the minimum age from 20 to 21?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is not in order, the Senate having voted upon one of the provisions already.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Chair decides the matter, I should like to call his attention, if he will permit me, to the fact that there is a distinction that still exists that has not been passed on by the Senate. Unless the question is allowed to be divided, we are now going to vote on two propositions. It is true that there has been a motion made to change one of them; but there is no way to tell how many Senators, by reason of the failure of that motion, might vote against the motion as it now stands who would like to vote for the proposition to raise the age; so there has been no opportunity so far for a direct vote on each proposition.

I submit to the Chair, therefore, that every reason still exists for the allowance of a division of the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the parliamentary status the Chair thinks this question is not divisible, and so holds. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). As I announced awhile ago, I have a pair for the day with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. If he were present, and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before of the transfer of my pair and that of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce the same transfer of my pair as on the prior roll call, and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call with reference to my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. Therefore, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (after having voted in the negative). I understand that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has not voted. I have a pair with that Senator. I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] if present would vote in favor of the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Brandegee	France	Lodge	Smoot
Calder	Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sterling
Colt	Gallinger	Nelson	Wadsworth
Cummins	Hale	New	Williams

So Mr. FALL's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I offer the following amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I say to the Senator that there are one or two committee amendments that have been passed over and there are a number of other committee amendments which I should like to dispose of before general amendments are considered? I think that is the usual rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the Senator from Nebraska that by the agreement under which the bill is being considered committee amendments are first in order. The Secretary will report the next committee amendment.

The SECRETARY. The first committee amendment passed over is, on page 106, to insert, "Chapter XI, Method of determining quotas for military service."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What amendment is that? I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has just been stated. Does the Senator desire to have the language of the amendment read?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand it refers to some title as it was reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 106 the committee proposes to insert a new chapter, to be known as "Chapter XI, Method of determining quotas for military service."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment was agreed to and reconsidered and passed over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the amendment was once agreed to and then reconsidered at the request of one of the Senators, and it was passed over.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, to this particular part of the bill I presented an amendment proposing that "credit shall be given on its quotas to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who have entered the military or naval service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof since May 1, 1917, including members of the National Guard who were in Federal service on that date"; but after hearing the testimony to which we have recently listened I do not desire at this time to press the amendment, but will leave it for ultimate determination when within the next 90 days we shall amend the draft law. I shall then, if it be appropriate, take it up with the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I withdraw my request for the reading of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Chapter XVI, page 117, "Aircraft Production Corporation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are a number of other committee amendments, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be stated in their order.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 7, strike out the period and substitute a colon and add:

Provided further, That no person otherwise qualified for service as a cadet, pilot, military aviator, or other officer in the aviation service, shall be barred from such service by reason of not being equipped with a college education.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has already been agreed to. It will be reconsidered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that it be reconsidered in order that this proviso may be added.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 64, after line 17, insert:

Drafted or enlisted men detailed for work: All drafted or enlisted men who have been or may be detailed or assigned to work at their respective trades or callings in factories, shops, or establishments, engaged in production of material for the Government, shall be paid by the proprietors or operators of such factories, shops, or establishments the same compensation or wages paid by them to their other employees engaged in the same service. During the period of such service the statutory pay of such men as soldiers shall be suspended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have another amendment to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 8, in the heading, strike out the words "Supplies, services, and transportation" and insert in lieu thereof "General appropriations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add as a new chapter, after chapter 11:

That the second clause of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, except citizens or subjects of countries neutral in the present war, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe, not inconsistent with the terms of this act."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That amendment was reported out as a committee amendment, but in view of the fact that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], who is a member of the committee, was not present and is understood to have a substitute to offer for it, it was done with the understanding that it would be considered in connection with the amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I send to the desk the substitute which I propose.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for the proposed amendment just read:

At the end of the second sentence of section 2 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917," add the following proviso:

"Provided, That a citizen or subject of a country neutral in the present war who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall be relieved from liability to military service upon his making a declaration, in accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe, withdrawing his intention to become a citizen of the United States, which shall operate and be held to cancel his declaration to become an American citizen."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I much regret that I was not present when the committee considered the amendment. The amendment approved by the committee is entirely inconsistent with the substitute which I offer. Both have been considered by the State Department. While the State Department prefers the one adopted by the committee, it is not opposed to the one which I propose.

The present law is that the draft includes declarants—that is, men who declare their intention to become citizens of the United States and have taken out their first papers. As far as our cobelligerents are concerned, that makes no difference; but when it comes to neutral countries, it interferes with treaty obligations, and it also interferes with the rule of international comity.

The State Department, therefore, desires that the War Department shall relieve declarants from enforced military service. Heretofore the War Department has refused to do it because it has construed the act of Congress as superseding a treaty, even superseding international comity. The State Department proposes—or at least this committee amendment proposes—absolutely to exclude declarants of neutral countries, and if that is carried out we shall lose tens of thousands of soldiers.

I propose in my proviso to leave the law as it is now and provide that when the declarant of a neutral country, through himself or through his ambassador or minister, asserts his immunity, he shall be relieved, but his act in appealing to his country shall serve to withdraw his application for American citizenship. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota, who rose first.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to know why the Senator has pulled the teeth out of his amendment. A great many of us favor this very strongly as it was introduced, believing that under the comity of nations we had no right to insist that one who had merely declared his intention and had not become a citizen should join our Military Establishment, but we were in hearty accord with the view that, after having declared his intention to become a citizen, if he then refused to perform the duties of a citizen and become a soldier he should forever be debarred from the right to become a citizen. I am sorry to have the Senator leave that out of his amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was because I learned through the State Department that we have a number of treaties with countries with which that might seem to be in conflict. I do not agree with the State Department on that interpretation, but after all it is not a matter of great importance to brand a man as incapable of ever becoming an American citizen. The important thing is this: When the declarant is excused from service in the Army through the interposition of the ambassador or minister of his country he is, in many States of the Union, still able to vote at the American elections. I want to deprive him of that right, so that when his American neighbor is drafted and goes to the war he can not use his immunity as a foreign citizen and still exercise the right of suffrage in this country. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I am entirely in sympathy with the Senator's amendment in what he seeks to accomplish, but does he accomplish it? Under the wording of the amendment after a man has pleaded exemption because he is a subject or citizen of another country, which he undoubtedly is, he forfeits his declaration of intention that he has already made. What is there to prevent him from going around the corner and taking out another one the next day and securing all the political rights which it brings with it in certain States? Ought there not to be an inhibition on his taking out another declaration, at least until the conclusion of the war?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think if the Senator from Massachusetts will reflect a moment he will see that it is within the discretion of our courts to grant or to refuse these applications, and while if I had thought of that idea I would have incorporated it in my amendment, I hardly think it is necessary.

It was suggested to me by a colleague just now that this amendment of mine will be welcomed by the foreign representatives of many of our neutral countries. They are at the present time burdened with thousands of applications from declarants who appeal to them for protection, and they would be glad to be relieved of that burden; they would be glad to have these declarants either remain as they have asserted and pledged themselves to be—American citizens—or be deprived of the right of American citizens. The result of it will be, in my opinion, that thousands of declarants who now appeal to neutral diplomatic representatives will go and serve the country they have already sworn to become citizens of; that they will not appeal to their ambassadors and their ministers in those neutral countries, and we think the Army will receive their service. If they do not, they certainly will not be allowed to remain in this country and vote when their American neighbors, native and naturalized, have been forced to go to the war.

I was very anxious to offer my amendment first, because it is a proviso added at the end of the second sentence of the existing law. If the amendment presented by the committee is adopted, it will amend the existing law so as to make my proviso a dead letter; that is, it will absolutely exempt all citizens of neutral countries in the United States who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States. I would therefore like to offer my amendment first or offer it as a substitute, if that is a parliamentary possibility.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will offer it as a substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is a great American principle which this Government adopted when Thomas Jefferson was Secretary of State and George Washington was President. It had already been adopted by the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to that time, when the Commonwealth was an independent State. It was the act of expatriation. It has always been a contention of this Government that any man has a right to move to a new country and declare his intention to become a citizen of that country, and with that declaration his citizenship in the old country ceases. This country has never admitted any dual citizenship. We have contended that when a man who came to us with a declaration in his mouth he was telling the truth. We have contended that he was not self-evidently a liar, and with his declaration he became an American by his own intent and by his own right to choose his own country.

Now, the amendment which is proposed here would leave things in this condition, if I understand it. A Turk or a Bulgarian, because his country is not at war with the United States, because he went into a court of justice and solemnly told a solemn lie to the effect that it was his intention to become a citizen of the United States, would be left free in the enjoyment of every privilege here, and when he wished to cancel what he solemnly said in solemn deed and go back and be a Turk or a Bulgarian he could go; or, at any rate, he need not fight for the United States, and if he could get away he could fight for Bulgaria.

Mr. President, we had better leave the law as it is.

There is some confusion in international law as to what the present law is, but at any rate America has never given up her contention, and I do not propose, for one, to stand for her giving it up in the slightest degree.

Even Turkey and Austria have never recognized a dual nationality. They have contended that the Turks or the Austrians could remain exclusively Turkish or Austrian subjects. We have only gone to the point of saying that wherever he declared his intention to become an American citizen, according to the laws of a State of the American Union, or became naturalized under the Federal law—either one—then he became an American, and we deny that he could be a citizen of any other country after that. Neither country has even contended for a dual nationality or has contended for an exclusive nationality of its own nationals.

Mr. President, I do not want to be caught here in this haphazard way with surrendering to the principle which the Old Dominion threw out on its flag to the world about 1787 or 1789 and which the United States Government under its first national administration, under the Father of the Country and the Father of Democracy both, indorsed as a sacred and solemn principle of this American Republic.

A man has a right to come up and declare his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States or of a State, and when he declares his intention of becoming a citizen of a State he is a citizen of one of these United States, and therefore a citizen of the United States—which, by the way, is a plural and not a singular term, and this "e pluribus unum" business and "these United States" constitute this country. When he does that, I am going to take it for granted that he is telling the truth, and that he is not a liar. I am not going to put anything upon the statute books that enables him to come up and confess solemnly that he is a liar, that when he said it was his intention to become a citizen of the United States he meant it only in "piping times of peace" and not if there happened to be a war.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the amendment the committee suggests, and not the one which is proposed as a substitute, does the very thing which the Senator from Mississippi is contending for. Now, let me call the attention of the Senate to the law as it is now contained in the draft act of 1917; and then I will call attention to the brief change that is proposed. The language of the act is:

> Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive.

That is as much as it is necessary to read to call the attention of the Senate to the fact. Now, the Senate will know, I think, that the draft act provision that all male citizens or male persons who have declared their intention to become citizens are subject to the draft inadvertently violated treaties that we have with several countries. I will call attention to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the chairman of the committee a question there?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator will let me finish this answer. That provision in the draft act violated the treaties which the United States has with Spain, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Great Britain. Those are the principal countries with which we have such treaties. But we have taken out of the provisions of that law Great Britain, and, I believe, possibly we are negotiating with reference to France and Italy. So, by the adoption of that provision in the draft act, we subjected to the draft nationals of countries that were absolutely protected by treaty stipulations.

Now, Mr. President, under decisions of the courts and under the rules of international law, the declarants for citizenship, those who have taken out their first papers, are still the nationals of their native country; they are not citizens of the United States. The proposal of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is to meet a condition which exists in his State and which probably exists in some other States of the Union, where, in violation of what seems to me to be good sense and good conscience, laws have been enacted allowing the nationals of other countries to vote. In other words——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will let me finish.

Those States have allowed the nationals of other countries—the Turks and the Bulgars, if you please—who have taken out their citizenship papers, to vote. Then, under the decisions of the courts, those people are not citizens of the United States and, therefore, can not be citizens of the particular States. The proposal of this bill is to relieve a situation which is pressing. Here the United States has impressed into the service subjects of Sweden, for instance—a neutral country—they have impressed into the service the neutrals of other countries who are either protected by treaty or who are asserting their right to be exempt from it. Notwithstanding that, the United States has gone ahead and sent them to the front. We find the ambassadors of these neutral countries protesting against the drafting of their nationals into the service, and the United States is going to have a heavy bill for damages to pay after a while.

The only purpose of the amendment which is suggested by the committee is to protect the nationals of such countries from the draft, in order to save the United States from the payment of damages because their citizens are being sent to the front. The amendment has met the approval of the Secretary of State; it has met the approval of the War Department. Both of those Secretaries, and particularly the Secretary of State, is here insisting that it should be adopted, because he is harassed all the time by claims for exemption from the draft, and the Solicitor for the State Department says that all of his time is taken up with trying to adjust the differences between our own country and other countries because the nationals of those countries have been impressed into the service.

Mr. LODGE. Does this apply to neutral countries?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. I wish, if he will allow me, to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. I want to ask him whether any treaty would be violated if we should provide by statute that those men—declarants, we may say—declare their intention to become citizens, and whether we might by law provide that they might complete their citizenship and then do their duty under the citizenship of America or go out and relinquish any rights that they have in this country and again become the aliens that they formerly were?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. A declarant does not become a citizen of the United States until he takes out his final papers, and that is at the end of five years. We have passed a law, however, which permits those who have served our country in time of war to take out their citizenship papers earlier.

Mr. WARREN. Exactly; and would it not therefore be well to provide by legislation now if necessary that such a declarant may at once complete his papers and become a citizen or else relinquish his intention?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That could be done.

Mr. WARREN. Would such legislation violate our treaties?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a voter in a State is a citizen of the United States. There is no such thing as an abstract citizenship of the United States regardless of a State, whether it be Illinois or Oregon or Mississippi or California. A man comes up and declares his intention to become a citizen of the United States and thereby becomes a voter in Oregon——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; he does not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the Senator from Oregon tells me that we impress that man into duty under the draft. We have done nothing of the sort. He has declared his own intention and willingness to become a volunteer, and what the Senator now desires is to let him impress himself upon the laws of the country as a voluntary liar.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is not the purpose of the proposed legislation. When a man declares his intention to become a citizen, he simply says, "I am going to become a citizen," and the United States imposes the condition on him, "You can not become a citizen until the end of five years."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a man comes up in the State of Oregon—he could not do it in Mississippi, thank God——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They do not go there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But he comes up in the State of Oregon, for instance, and declares his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and thereby becomes a voter in the State of Oregon and obtains all the privileges and immunities of citizenship of the United States under the fourteenth amendment, which is the only citizenship of the United States known to our law; but whether or not he does that—that question might be disputed and argued—he does become a citizen of the State of Oregon or of Illinois or of whatever other States this law applies to; I do not know just what the States are, but he gets all the immunities and privileges of citizenship, and now he wants to relieve himself of the burdens and the duties. Our draft law says that the men who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and by consequence of that declaration have become citizens of particular States, are subject to the draft. That is all it says. You can not subject a man in Mississippi to the draft because he has declared his intention to become a citizen, because under the laws of Mississippi he could not be a voter if he declared his intention 40 times to become a citizen; but when he goes to the State of Illinois—if that be the law there; I am not certain as to that, but I think it is—and declares his intention there, he becomes a citizen of the State of Illinois.

Mr. LODGE. The law is general; it applies to all declarants, whether they have rights in a State or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that; but in States where they are not made voters there are no declarants.

Mr. LODGE. There are plenty of them in my State and the Senator's, too, who have no civil rights whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, this amendment ought to be made to apply to them and to nobody else——

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it ought not to apply to men who obtain the right of voting and rights of property and protection and immunity in a State by getting the suffrage.

Mr. LODGE. They do not obtain those rights in my State; but they are liable to the draft as declarants.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But they get them in many other States.

Mr. LODGE. They do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, if we want to make this amendment right, let it apply only to those who have declared their intention to become citizens in States where they can not become voters.

Now, Mr. President, another thing. The Senator from Oregon talks about the sacredness of certain treaties with Sweden, Norway, and other countries. If the Supreme Court has ever settled anything at all, it has settled this, that whichever of the two is the latest in date, whether a treaty or a law of the United States, repeals the other.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi and of other Senators to the fact that, although by this amendment it is proposed to cancel what we call "first papers," the intention papers, and they are canceled, there is nothing to prevent an alien from going to the clerk of a court after he has obtained immunity from the draft and taking out new intention papers. He has got to do that to become a citizen anyway; and he can, under this amendment, take that step after he has been excused.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have never looked into that.

Mr. NELSON. The mere fact that the declaration of intention which he has made before seeking immunity is canceled does not debar him from making a new declaration after he has obtained his immunity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no doubt about that as an abstract question. I take it he could go ahead and make a new declaration, of course, but still he can escape his duties under the old one by canceling it after he has had all the privileges and immunities of a citizen of Minnesota, of Massachusetts, or of Wisconsin.

Mr. McCUMBER. In other words, Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator, as supplemental to what he has said, if this committee amendment is adopted the declarant can by his vote force us into war and then escape any service in war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that is not all, Mr. President; the declarant can not only force us into war by his vote and then escape military service, which is a thing that would seem incredible if it were not a fact, but after we ourselves have been forced into war with a foreign country he can stand here as a miserable traitor and vote in 11 or 12 States of this Union, and while voting to elect governors, Senators, and Representatives he can beat honest men from electing loyal men. That is what he can do.

What I contend for is that if a man by his own word has declared his intention to make an American citizen of himself, make him one. I am not pressing him into service; I am not making an American out of him by law; I am simply standing by a law which admits that he has told the truth and does not set up that he is a liar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for a roll call on the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Would it be in order to have the amendment to the amendment again stated? I think there is some misunderstanding about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the proviso be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee it is proposed to insert:

At the end of the second sentence of section 2 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917," add the following proviso:

"Provided, That a citizen or subject of a country neutral in the present war who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall be relieved from liability to military service upon his making a declaration, in accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe, withdrawing his intention to become a citizen of the United States, which shall operate and be held to cancel his declaration to become an American citizen."

Mr. FALL and Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He withdraws his previous declaration, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule of the Senate is that a Senator shall arise and address the Chair. When five Senators are standing, it is difficult for the Chair to know who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FALL. I am only one of the five, not the whole five.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senator from New Mexico did rise, and the Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, in the Martin Koszta case the United States faced Austria in arms over this question. Koszta was a declarant, and nothing more. He was in Smyrna, and was arrested by the Austrian authorities upon the ground that he was a deserter or had evaded military service in Austria. The American consul demanded that he be released; but, instead of releasing him, he was turned over to the commander of an Austrian ship of war. Capt. Ingraham, commanding an American ship of war in the harbor, demanded his release on the ground that he was entitled to the protection of the United States as a declarant. He had not taken out his final papers. The release of Koszta was refused. Ingraham cleared his decks, trained his guns upon the Austrian ship, and demanded and secured the release of Koszta. He was sustained by the political department of this Government, which refused the demand of Austria for reparation or that Koszta be returned to them, and the Congress of the United States by a resolution sustained the action of the political authorities and voted a medal of honor to Ingraham.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And established the principle, if the Senator will pardon me, of asserting that that carried with it the immunities and privileges of American citizenship, though it might not carry the privilege of voting in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall not argue the venerable Martin Koszta case, with which everybody is familiar. I merely wish to suggest that the amendment as it now stands seems to me futile. I think we have got to add to it a prohibition against the alien receiving further first papers until at least the end of the war. That will give it effect.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have already indicated to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that I shall be glad to perfect my amendment by accepting such a change.

Mr. LODGE. I should be glad to see citizenship refused altogether.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether that would not be covered by the regulations which the President might prescribe? The amendment provides that this proceeding may take place under certain regulations to be prescribed by the President.

Mr. LODGE. No; it gives the President no power to prevent the alien taking out new papers. The next day he may take them out.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, not only is that true, but under the law the man would have a perfect right again to go to a court, and the court could not deny him the opportunity of filing his first papers again unless, as is suggested, a prohibition is put in the statute.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, it would be a useless thing to deprive him of his first papers if he could take them out again.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes to add, at the end of the proposed substitute of the Senator from Nebraska, the following words:

> And he shall not be entitled to make a new declaration during the existence of the war in which the United States is now engaged.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska accept that change?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], on which question the yeas and nays have been requested.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Nebraska if he is not willing to make a part of his amendment the previous declaration that a person who has declared his intention to become a citizen and then, in order to escape military service in the United States, withdraws that declaration, shall be forever prohibited from becoming a citizen of the United States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am endeavoring to get this amendment in such shape that it will be adopted; and while my judgment concurs with that of the Senator from North Dakota, I am confronted with the serious objection of the State Department. As it is now, the State Department has no objection to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in that connection I should like to ask the Senator in what treaty ever made by us was there an agreement as to whom we should admit to citizenship or whom the other nation should admit to citizenship?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not the names of the countries.

Mr. LODGE. As to naturalization, do I understand that the State Department says that in any treaty we agree to admit certain people to naturalization?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no. The contention of the State Department, let me say to the Senator, is that it is a question of drafting into the service.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, I understand that; but the objection the Senator from Nebraska makes is to what he originally had in his amendment, which prevented these men who had declared their intention of becoming American citizens from then claiming—as I think they had a legal right to do—that they were subjects of a foreign power, and therefore could not be drafted. The Senator from Nebraska met that with a proposition that if they made that claim of exemption, and received it, they should be forever ineligible to become citizens of the United States, with which I am in entire sympathy. The Senator now says, however, that the State Department objects to that provision on the ground that it interferes with treaties; and I am anxious to know what treaty there is in which we guarantee to admit anybody to citizenship or to first papers or anything else?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I perhaps went too far when I said "the State Department." I should have said "an official of the State Department," because he has represented the matter to me in the following language:

> This amendment violates treaties with several neutral countries, in that it prevents neutral declarants from becoming citizens of the United States. The United States has treaties for reciprocal naturalization with Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Costa Rica, Haiti, Nicaragua, Peru, Salvador, Honduras, and Uruguay.

I must confess that that was a surprise to me.

Mr. LODGE. It is a surprise to me. I should like to know the terms of those reciprocal naturalization treaties.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will withdraw the statement that the State Department objected to it. Only one official of the State Department has called my attention to these treaties, and thought that while it is all right to withdraw their declaration of intention it might be questionable whether we should say that they are forever prevented from becoming citizens of the United States. I believe that what we really want to accomplish is to let these declarants know that if they appeal to the foreign countries they will have to give up the papers they now hold. That will result in keeping many more men in our Army, it will result in relieving the ministers from a great many appeals, and it will relieve the State Department from a great deal of work.

Mr. LODGE. I did not know that there were any treaties that interfered with our right of saying who should be citizens of the United States, and I should like to inquire into it. But, Mr. President, the thing we want to meet at this time is to prevent these men who have claimed exemption because they are subjects or citizens of another power, after they have taken out their first papers, from going around the corner and taking out another set of papers, and, in many States, exercising all of the rights of citizens, all the privileges of electing men to office, and everything of that kind, while they send the native-born Americans or the naturalized Americans across the water.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator fully, and for that reason I have accepted the change proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I shall oppose the amendment. I do not agree at all with the legal conclusions of this official of the State Department. We have naturalization treaties with certain countries, it is true. They are referred to here, if the Senate desires to hear them; but there is nothing in any one of those treaties which prevents our classifying or in any way providing the conditions upon which we will admit citizens. That is the prerogative of this great Government of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. It is the prerogative of every sovereign state.

Mr. FALL. We can pass a law repealing in a moment all of our naturalization laws, despite our treaties, and we do not violate a treaty with a single country with which we have a treaty. We can repeal them absolutely. Why, sir, that is a prerogative of the Government.

Mr. LODGE. And, if the Senator will allow me, we have recently entirely revised and changed our naturalization laws and imposed new conditions.

Mr. FALL. Why, certainly; but, Mr. President, to say that even under any treaty of any kind or character the United States Government can not at any time pass just such legislation as was indicated in the first amendment of the Senator without violating a treaty is ridiculous. We can create a class of those citizens of neutral countries who refuse their military duty here, and say that they shall never become citizens, if we so desire.

Mr. LODGE. Of course we can.

Mr. FALL. It is a classification which is permissible, as the Supreme Court has decided in the Terry case, and time and time again.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The proposition involved here, Mr. President, is not the question of treaties with respect to naturalization laws, but the question as to those treaties which provide that the nationals of a country shall not be impressed into the military service.

Mr. FALL. Certainly; but, Mr. President, there is no court which does not hold that the status of full-fledged citizenship may not be bestowed until after final papers are taken out. There never has been a court that has not held that the status has been changed by a declaration of intention to become a citizen.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator is right; but that is not the position which either the War Department or the State Department takes. Gen. Crowder took the position that the nationals of other countries who have come here and taken out their first papers could be impressed into the service, and the original draft law was drawn on that theory.

Mr. FALL. Gen. Crowder was right then.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, later, for some reason—and I do not know why—they have changed their front on that question, and now hold that where the ambassador of a neutral country protests against the impressment of a declarant we have no right to impress him into our service.

Mr. FALL. From what has been said I should judge that Gen. Crowder has been influenced by pressure brought to bear by some official of the State Department, and has revised his decision. I have in my hand the treaty with Norway. I have not read it, but I am satisfied that there is nothing in that treaty or in any other naturalization treaty which would be to the contrary of the position which has been announced by the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the treaty with Norway, for instance, should provide that their nationals should be entitled to the same rights of citizenship that other nationals had, then this would be a violation of the treaty, because it applies only to neutrals. We unquestionably would have a right to make a uniform rule as to all nationals, but if we should confine it to the neutrals it might be a violation of a treaty, might it not?

Mr. FALL. I do not think so, under the theory that belligerents have an entirely different status than neutrals; and therefore we might leave out of consideration entirely the citizens of belligerents in dealing with citizens of neutral countries. I will read the provision of the treaty with Norway, for example, as that has been referred to:

> Citizens of the United States of America who have resided in Sweden or Norway for a continuous period of at least five years, and during such residence have become and are lawfully recognized as citizens of Sweden or Norway, shall be held by the Government of the United States to be Swedish or Norwegian citizens and shall be treated as such.

In other words, if our citizens choose to take advantage of the Swedish or Norwegian naturalization laws, we simply recognize their right of expatriation; that is all.

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely; that is all.

Mr. FALL (reading)—

> Reciprocally, citizens of Sweden or Norway who have resided in the United States of America for a continuous period of at least five years, and during such residence have become naturalized citizens of the United States, shall be held by the Government of Sweden and Norway to be American citizens, and shall be treated as such.

Why, Mr. President, all that this is and all that these treaties are is a recognition of the right of expatriation, which some of the countries have never agreed to recognize.

Mr. LODGE. For which we have fought for years.

Mr. FALL. For which we have fought, and which Germany to-day denies.

Mr. LODGE. And the condemnation of the doctrine of indefeasible allegiance.

Mr. FALL. That is all.

Mr. LODGE. They joined with us in recognizing the right of expatriation. I thought that was all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. LODGE. Before that question is put I just want to say that I hope that amendment will be adopted; and I shall reserve the right when the bill gets into the Senate to try to restore to it the original phraseology of the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the request for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Announcing the pair which I have heretofore announced with reference to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], I refrain from voting.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. We will exchange our pairs so that the Senator from Pennsylvania will stand paired with the Senator from Georgia. I vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KING. The senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has been called from the Chamber on official business. He is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. SIMMONS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMPSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is not present. I have a general pair with that Senator. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] did not vote. As I am paired with that Senator, I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—43.

Ashurst	Gronna	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Guion	New	Smith, S. C.

Hale	McLean	Smith, Md.
Harding	McNary	Swanson

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment to the amendment of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FRANCE obtained the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator from Maryland excuse me? Unless the Senator wishes to address the Senate this afternoon, I was going to move to take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. FRANCE. That is agreeable to me.

SALARIES OF STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2104) to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which were, on page 2, after line 8, to insert: "The Secretary of Commerce may appoint a Deputy Supervising Inspector General, who shall be the chief clerk of the bureau and in the absence of the Supervising Inspector General have power to act in his stead, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 per year"; on page 3, line 25, to strike out "$2,900" and insert "$2,950"; on page 5, line 9, to strike out "Chicago, Ill., and insert "Providence, R. I."; on page 6, after line 6, to insert: "That all officers and employees provided for in this act shall not receive the additional compensation authorized by section 6 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919."

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a letter from the Secretary of Commerce sustaining the amendments, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, June 28, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: On Wednesday, June 26, 1918, the House of Representatives passed S. 2104, "to amend sections 4402, 4404, and 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States," with certain amendments adopted on the floor when the bill was under consideration. Those amendments were as follows:

A new paragraph was inserted and made the last paragraph of section 4402 of the bill:

"The Secretary of Commerce may appoint a deputy supervising inspector general, who shall be the chief clerk of the bureau and, in the absence of the supervising inspector general, have power to act in his stead, and who shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 per year."

This amendment was submitted by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and agreed to by the House.

The figures "2,900," in the sixth line, page 4 of the bill, were stricken out and the figures "2,950" were inserted in lieu thereof. This amendment was also submitted by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The words "Chicago, Ill.," in the fourteenth line, page 5 of the bill, were stricken out, and the words "Providence, R. I.," were inserted in lieu thereof. This amendment was made on the floor of the House by one of the Members.

The following paragraph was inserted next to the last paragraph of the bill:

"That all officers and employees provided for in this act shall not receive the additional compensation authorized by section 6 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919."

This amendment was offered by a member of the Committee on Appropriations and was agreed to.

The fact that amendments were made to the bill in the House necessitates, of course, that it go to a conference committee. The amendments adopted by the House have the approval of this department, and I earnestly hope that they will meet with the approval of the Senate, and that the conferees of the Senate will agree to the bill as enacted by the House.

Very truly, yours, WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Secretary.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, June 29, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 28, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, as we pass this way but once, help us to leave in our wake some thought or deed worthy of emulation, if it be only to plant a tree or flower, dig a well, or lift some forlorn soul into a higher altitude.

If there be jealousy, malice, hate, or revenge in our hearts, remove them far from us, that love and good will may grow and strengthen us.

If the energy expended by Germany in the awful war they have thrust upon the world with malice aforethought, hate, and revenge could have been consecrated to worthy deeds of liberty and justice, what a happy world this might be to dwell in under the leadership of the world's great Exemplar! Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOON. Does the Journal show that the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 7237) was agreed to or rejected?

The SPEAKER. It shows that it was rejected.

Mr. MOON. That is all right.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to have the Journal corrected so as to show that the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill was agreed to. That is the fact, and a count of the list of names that the Clerk did not read in full will demonstrate it. It is a fact from the RECORD that the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To correct the Journal and the RECORD.

Mr. STEENERSON. I can demonstrate the fact, and a count of the list will show it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has stated that twice.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, as everybody in the House knows, I am very much opposed to the conference report. I voted against it. In the quiet discussion, after the vote was taken and the decision announced by the Chair as to whether the figures of the tally clerk were correct as he announced it to the Speaker after the recapitulation of the vote, I went myself and examined the original sheets of the roll call. I found there were 150 votes for the conference report and 149 votes against it. The Chair, upon the tally clerk's figures, announced that there were 149 votes for the conference report and 150 votes against, and declared the report was rejected.

The Constitution requires that upon demand a yea-and-nay vote shall be recorded in the Journal. The Journal shows, according to the record of the vote, that there were 150 votes for the conference report and 149 votes against it, and that therefore the tabulation or addition of the tally clerk was wrong. I think the Journal and RECORD ought to be corrected to show the actual fact that the conference report was adopted and not rejected. Any court in the world would correct its own judgment under the circumstances. It is not fair, it is not right, for us who opposed the conference report to insist that the report was rejected.

Mr. MOON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman is mistaken in his facts. The gentleman is kind to others, but he is not kind to our own side.

Mr. KITCHIN. I say that we must go by the RECORD; that is, the actual yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. MOON. The RECORD does not sustain the gentleman. The RECORD shows that there were 149 votes for the conference report and 149 votes against it, and that loses the conference report.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman refers to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, by the Journal, and the actual vote by the yeas and nays. Of course, if there were only 149 votes for the conference report and 149 against it, the report would be rejected, and the Journal should so show.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from Georgia called my attention to it, and we counted it over three times; and the vote as recorded shows 149 votes for and 149 against.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. ROSE, voted in the affirmative and he is not recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD among those who voted, though his vote is counted in the number 150.

Mr. MOON. Then we will have to have another vote.

The SPEAKER. That mistake in the RECORD was a mistake at the Printing Office.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE] did vote. The tally sheet shows that he did. His name appears on the yea-and-nay roll as voting aye. I went over it very carefully yesterday, because there was much concern about it, and there were 150 for the report and 149 against it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now. If Mr. ROSE is not recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, from which the gentleman from Tennessee is reading, as being in favor of the report, the record as to that ought to be corrected, as the Journal shows it. Everybody in the House saw and heard him vote. On the recapitulation Mr. ROSE arose in his seat and asked if he was recorded, and the Speaker replied, "Yes," that he was recorded in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Journal does show that Mr. ROSE voted "yea."

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think, then, that the gentleman from Tennessee would dispute that proposition. If Mr. ROSE actually voted yea, and the Journal shows it, the record ought to be corrected to show that he did, and the vote for the report must be admitted to be 150 and against it 149.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, on the roll call on page 8387 of the RECORD of yesterday I am recorded as not voting.

The SPEAKER. Is that the roll call we are now talking about?

Mr. ROSE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. But the Journal shows that the gentleman did vote "yea."

Mr. ROSE. It may be that the Journal is correct, but I ask to have that correction made in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. It will be made in the RECORD. The Journal is always correct.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, if that be true, and the Journal attests its truth, I am sure that the gentleman from Tennessee will not dispute the proposition, nor will any opponent of the conference report, that it is just and right that the decision should be rendered correctly, according to the actual yea-and-nay vote. The House can not afford to do otherwise.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I acquiesce very cheerfully as a Democrat, for it is the fundamental principle of the party, in the proposition that we should abide by the will of the majority, honestly expressed, but that will must be expressed fairly and honestly, and no doubt must be left, nor must there be any suspicion of fraud. Let us look at the facts of the case. There was a roll call announcement made by the tellers that the conference report had been agreed to. There was a recapitulation of that vote, and upon the recapitulation of that vote, counted and counted over twice again, the Speaker of this House announced that the vote rejected the conference report, that a majority had voted against the confirmation of that report, and for an hour here the parties contended as to whether the House should remain in session for the purpose of making a motion to reconsider—a second action sought, by the way, on this question—and finally the motion to adjourn prevailed. There is no man on the floor of the House, the Speaker included, who will say for a moment that this House adjourned with any other understanding than that expressed in this RECORD by the Speaker, that the conference report had been rejected. [Applause.] We left here with that understanding. The final announcement was that way by the Speaker.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Not now.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under what rule of the House is the gentleman from Tennessee addressing the House? I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota can not take the gentleman from Tennessee off his feet by a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. He has not been taken off his feet.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says that no man left here without the understanding that the conference report had been rejected——

The SPEAKER. Oh, gentlemen can not deny every statement a man makes on the floor of the House.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I assert again there would have been no sense in the contest on the question of adjournment but for the fact that it was so understood. You would have been making fools of yourselves if you had not been here for the purpose of moving to reconsider. You finally lost, and adjournment came. It was with the understanding that the conference report had been rejected. I want to say this, if, as a matter of fact, the conference report was agreed to, I would have nothing more to say, but the final announcement was that it was rejected. If that announcement had been the other way, there would have been a movement upon this side to have corrected the condition last evening, but it was not so made. What happened? Overnight you find a change. I am not here to say that anyone has acted dishonorably or dishonestly in any way in connection with this matter. Mistakes may have been made and probably were made about this, but let me ask this of the House: When you recapitulated that vote there were over a hundred men who had voted, who were not here to ascertain whether they had voted and been recorded correctly or not. There was room for a possible 100 mistakes on that question. you do not know to-day from what the record shows whether they are correctly recorded or not. It went overnight with the understanding that it was the other way. The question comes up this morning, with a change in the attitude as to the vote. Whether there was fraud in that or not is not for me to say, but I do say that you do yourselves great discredit when you open the doors to fraud and do not take the way to close it. If you want to settle this thing honestly and thoroughly, there is but one thing to do, and that is to vacate these proceedings.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. MOON. Not now. Just let the gentleman take his seat. I have the floor for the present. What I want to say is this, if you want to get a fair expression of the House, one that does not lie under the suspicion of fraud by a change overnight in the vote, then vacate the proceedings down to the point of submitting this question to a vote of the House again. [Applause.]

If you get by a majority, you can have it. I undertake to say that no honest man will disagree to that proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] talks about fraud and makes intimations which are very unfair to a large body of the membership who favor the retention of the pneumatic-tube service. What the gentleman from Tennessee wants to do now, apparently, is to avoid the vote taken yesterday. I want him to stand by that vote. The gentleman now wants a reconsideration. I want the record made yesterday to stand, without any juggling and without any gags. The gentleman might as well know that we stand on the record, stand on it just as it was made yesterday. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I watched the proceedings yesterday with great care. I believed an error was made in the count and that it would have to be corrected this morning. I wish the Speaker and the gentlemen of the House would now take up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and turn to page 8386.

Examine the roll call on the adoption of the Post Office appropriation bill conference report, page 8386, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 27, 1918. As recorded it shows yeas 150, nays 149. On that showing, according to the RECORD, page 8387, "the conference report was agreed to." On page 8388 of the same RECORD, a discussion of the vote having intervened, the following appears:

> The SPEAKER. The Chair has never announced the vote. The yeas are 149, the nays are 150, and the conference report is rejected.

The RECORD then shows repeated demands for a recapitulation of the vote, but on page 8390 appears the following:

> Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask if the Speaker has had any additional report from the tally clerk?
> The SPEAKER. The last report from the tellers confirms the announcement the Speaker made.

Mind you, there had been discussion. It had been declared that the conference report was adopted by a vote of 150 to 149, and then came the Speaker's announcement, due to report of the tally clerks, that the report was rejected. Look further. The RECORD speaks for itself.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield at that point? Was that after the recapitulation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was after the tally clerk had reported to the Speaker that the Speaker reported this reversal of judgment, which I constantly challenged from the floor, demanding a recapitulation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It was after the recapitulation when it was found the vote for was 149 and against 150 that Mr. ROSE called attention to the fact that he had voted "Present" and afterwards had voted "Aye" and should be recorded.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The RECORD will show that the gentleman is in error. The gentleman will find, if he will read the RECORD, that Mr. ROSE qualified in the regular way, that he voted "Yea," but is left out of the "Yea" list. The RECORD shows there were repeated demands for a recapitulation of the vote.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. How does the vote stand if Mr. ROSE's vote is counted?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A hundred and fifty in favor of the adoption of the report and 149 against.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. No——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am absolutely right. In view of the resulting confusion over the vote up to the time of adjournment, and in order that the RECORD may now be clarified and corrected, I recur to the roll call as it is officially recorded. It is evident from a count of the yeas and nays as recorded that there are but 149 names entered in the "yea" column, although the tally clerks reported 150, and that there are 149 names recorded in the "nay" column. That would present a tie vote, including that of Mr. GOOD, of Iowa, about which there was discussion, and that of the Speaker, who broke the tie originally reported. But the name of Mr. ROSE, of Pennsylvania, who duly qualified, does not appear in the "yea" column of the roll call. When the RECORD is corrected, however, to include in the yea column the name of Mr. ROSE, of Pennsylvania, the total vote will be 150 yeas (for the adoption of the conference report) and 149 nays. That is the way it stands—150 yeas on the adoption of the conference report to 149 nays, just as the Speaker originally announced. There can be no mistake about it. The conference report was not rejected, and those who favored its adoption win. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina if he desires to make a motion?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to make this further statement. The question before the House is not one as to whether the conference report shall be adopted or whether it was right or wrong. The only thing before this House is, shall the action of the House, the yea-and-nay vote of the membership of this House, recorded under the requirements of the Constitution, control, or shall the erroneous addition of two tally clerks control? [Applause.] The Constitution requires a yea-and-nay vote when demanded to be entered in the Journal. That is to be the finality of the matter, unless some error is made in the Journal. Now, a yea-and-nay vote was taken; it was entered in the Journal. The Journal shows 150 for the report and 149 against the report, and unless some gentleman contends and shows that the Journal is incorrect as to the yea-and-nay vote, that it erroneously records the vote of some Member or Members, then the House, in the name of its own self-respect, and in the name of its integrity and the integrity of its legislation, can not do other than render its verdict and decision in exact accordance with that yea-and-nay vote. [Applause.] And the RECORD and the Journal ought to be corrected so as to speak the truth and make the announcement of the Speaker instead of reading "the conference report is rejected," to read "the conference report is agreed to."

If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], or the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], or any other gentleman who thinks that the action I suggest is wrong can show that the Journal is wrong as to the yea-and-nay vote, that some man voted "yea" that really did vote "nay," or that some man is recorded voting "yea" who was not present, then, of course, the Journal should be corrected and the judgment of the House recorded accordingly. But there is no insistence upon that. No man makes that claim. The real yea-and-nay original sheet shows the vote just as it was cast.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KITCHIN. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the Journal and the RECORD be corrected in conformity with the action of the House.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What point of order?

Mr. HEFLIN. On yesterday Mr. ROSE claimed——

The SPEAKER. But the Chair would like to know what the point of order is.

Mr. HEFLIN. I make the point of order that Mr. ROSE claims that he voted in the affirmative on yesterday, but that his vote was not recorded on that side. I want to state that Mr. GORDON was present and wanted to vote in the negative, but was not permitted to do so, and that if he had voted in the negative his vote would have tied the vote and defeated the conference report, which compelled the Government to continue the use of the pneumatic-tube service. In view of that fact, I want to move that the proceedings be vacated, so that this House may now have the opportunity to express itself upon this pneumatic-tube service provision.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes just to read an excerpt from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday on this vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin——

Mr. HEFLIN. I object, unless I have two minutes in which to state the situation to the House.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] moves that the Journal be amended so as to show 150 votes for the report and 149 against it, and that the Speaker is authorized to announce a decision contrary to that announced yesterday.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not a fact that the Speaker ought himself, in view of the fact that he now knows that the RECORD which was made yesterday, in so far as it shows his statement, was incorrect, and is it not all that is necessary for the Speaker to do, to correct the RECORD, as he has undoubtedly examined it, in accordance with the facts as he now knows them?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] made a perfectly proper motion.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said to correct the Journal. The Journal, I understand, is correct; but I mean to correct the RECORD to conform to the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina. Those in favor of the motion will vote "aye."

The affirmative vote was taken.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Last night this House adjourned with the understanding that the negative had won. [Cries of "Vote! Vote!"] But for that we would have made a motion to reconsider the vote last night.

The SPEAKER. It is in order to make that motion now.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. You can not do it until we have gotten rid of the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina may be stated again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] moves——

Mr. KITCHIN. That the RECORD be corrected to conform with the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from North Carolina state the motion?

Mr. KITCHIN. Anyway, if the Journal shows that the conference report was rejected, then I move that the Journal and the RECORD be corrected in conformity with the action of the House, showing the vote to be 150 for the conference report and 149 against the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, with the consent of the House, would like to make a few remarks about this matter.

This is the first time for a long while that this has been done, and perhaps not a dozen men in the House ever saw the thing done before. But it is not unprecedented. I am going to take that up in half a minute.

Now, the way the Chair arrives at a yea-and-nay vote in the House is by these tally clerks handing up the figures. Of course the Chair can not go down there and count the votes, and would not know how to do it if he did go down there. They have some system of their own whereby when they get through with the roll they know the number of the yeas and nays and those present. And then these clerks over here at the desk take that tally sheet out and go over it, one of them a Democrat and one a Republican, and I never heard of anybody that disputed the integrity of either.

Everybody will recollect that yesterday was a very hard, disagreeable day in this House. It began early in the morning and ran clear to supper time—bedtime, nearly. [Laughter.] Everybody was worn out and frazzled out, and it is not the first time in the history of this House that clerks have made a mistake in arithmetic. I know of a good many that Members never hear of at all in the counting, and there is nothing unreasonable about it. The clerks are not perfect.

Now, it has so turned out, I suppose, a dozen times since I have been Speaker. I do not read the RECORD every morning unless there is something particular about it that I want to see. At least a dozen times since I have been Speaker I have happened to remember the vote taken here, and then I would see it next morning showing a difference of two or three; but it did not make any difference, because the corrections they made did not change the result. It is only when it changes the result that the "tug of war" comes.

Now, about Mr. GORDON'S vote. The Chair can not afford to make a ruling in one case that he is not willing to stick to in all cases. It does not make any difference whether he likes what the man is doing or does not. As a matter of fact, the Chair did not know how the gentleman was going to vote and did not care. But I interrogated him, just as I interrogate everybody who comes down before the desk, and he answered positively that he was in the cloakroom, or smoking room, as he called it. The rule is that Members must be in the Hall of the House and listening when their names are called. It may be a bad rule. I do not know whether it is a bad or good one. I am not going to pronounce upon it. But, anyhow, Mr. GORDON, being a truthful man, put himself out. That is exactly what he did. [Applause.] If he had been willing to stretch the truth a little, he could have voted. He did not do it. So much for that. One time it will help one side of a question and at another time another side.

Now, I want to show you a sample of what happened here. I cite a case on page 566, section 6085, of Hinds' Precedents, volume 5:

Where, by an error of the Clerk in reporting the yeas and nays, the Speaker announces a result different from that shown by the roll the status of the question must be determined by the vote as actually recorded.

Now, here is Speaker Carlisle's opinion, and nobody will dispute about his intellectual endowments. I read:

On July 26, 1886, Mr. William C. Oates, of Alabama, rising immediately after the reading of the Journal, said:

"Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the Journal wherein it states that on the last bill under consideration at the evening session on Saturday, on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cobb] for the previous question on the bill and pending amendments, it was announced that no quorum voted thereon. That point was made, and the House, under a misapprehension, supposed it was so. In fact, a quorum had voted, and the previous question was ordered. The RECORD shows there were 128 yeas and 37 nays, making 165 votes. That was the fact; but the House, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Boyle] that no quorum had voted, accepted that as correct, although in fact a quorum had voted and the previous question was ordered."

Now, I will read Speaker Carlisle's opinion. It is short. The Speaker said:

The Journal will be corrected in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from Alabama. The Chair desires to state, as a matter of justice to the tally clerk, that in recording the affirmative vote in the column assigned for that purpose upon the sheet, when that vote had reached 49 he put down the figures 49 and called two or three more names before there was any other vote in the affirmative. When the next gentleman voted in the affirmative the tally clerk, looking back to his previous figures, took the 9 for a 4—and it looks very much like a 4, as the gentleman from Alabama will see if he examines it—and therefore recorded the next vote as 45, when it should have been 50—

That is five times as bad as these clerks did. [Laughter.]

and that error was continued until the close of the roll call, and the footings were made accordingly. It was a mistake made simply by the tally clerk on account of mistaking the figure. The Chair, therefore, thinks the Journal should be corrected to show the previous question was ordered.

In conformity with Mr. KITCHIN'S motion, the Chair announces that the vote stood 150 yeas, 149 nays, and the conference report is agreed to.

Mr. GORDON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. GORDON. Under the status I had, as the Chair announced, would it be in order for me to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the conference report was adopted?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move——

The SPEAKER. Wait until the Chair can get a chance to answer.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that——

The SPEAKER. What is the point?

Mr. WALSH. That the motion to reconsider is not now in order, having already been made.

The SPEAKER. When was it made?

Mr. WALSH. The Journal shows that on motion of Mr. KITCHIN, the vote whereby the conference report was declared lost was considered as reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. That was a prior vote.

Mr. WALSH. That was the vote whereby the Speaker declared the conference report rejected on the viva voce vote. It is on the same question.

Mr. FOSTER. That could not be good in that case.

Mr. WALSH. It is the same question. You can not have half a dozen motions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will clear that up in a second. A motion to reconsider is in order, but it must be made by somebody who voted in the affirmative.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STAFFORD. To raise the question of order, that at this time it is not in order to enter a motion to reconsider; and if the Chair will hear me——

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. All gentlemen will take their seats. Now, what is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I misunderstood the ruling of the Chair, and therefore I will not press the point of order. I understood the Chair to hold that you could enter a motion to reconsider, and therefore I was going to maintain that you could not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not get quite through with his statement. The motion to reconsider is in order if made by any gentleman who voted in the affirmative.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is that position that I wish to take issue with and will the Chair grant me deference, based on the precedents?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman wait until the Chair finishes his statement—but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] can not make the motion to reconsider, because he never voted at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not care to take exception to that decision unless some person who is qualified to make the point makes the motion. I have the precedents here.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair was going to suggest.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To call the attention of the Speaker to the request for unanimous consent by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already passed on that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. To prefer a request for unanimous consent. In view of the fact that a majority of the Members of this House, and a majority of those present this morning, will vote against this conference report if an opportunity is given, I ask unanimous consent to vacate all proceedings had upon that matter and that we now proceed to vote upon the question.

Mr. MEEKER. I object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry that may be of importance in settling this whole dispute.

Mr. MADDEN. It is settled already.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood that the gentleman on the other side of the aisle had just made a motion.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. No!

The SPEAKER. He tried to make one, but somebody objected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. FESS. For the sake of the integrity of the rules I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. When an error appears on the RECORD does it take a vote of the House to correct it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it does, and the Chair thinks the gentleman from Iowa made a correct point; but the gentleman from North Carolina had already made his motion, and the Chair thought the House would be better satisfied to settle the matter itself.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Inasmuch as I voted in the negative yesterday, but am convinced from an examination of the RECORD that the affirmative was entitled to the decision, I desire first to read a few lines from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 8388, and to suggest that they are decisive of this controversy.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, am I recorded as voting?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Clerk informs the Speaker that he did not read the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania first, but he has just now added it to the names of those voting in the affirmative.

But he did not add Mr. ROSE'S name to the affirmative list in so far as the RECORD shows.

The SPEAKER. That is corrected in the Journal.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand. But, if the Chair please, if the name of Mr. ROSE had appeared in the RECORD as voting in the affirmative, as the Speaker announced that the Clerk had just told him it would appear, that would have made 150 yeas by the RECORD also, and entirely justified the Chair in announcing as he did that the conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal as amended will stand approved.

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call up a conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 11692).

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to recognize the gentleman from Mississippi to file his conference report. He was carrying it around here all day yesterday, trying to get a chance to present it.

Mr. SISSON. I ask unanimous consent that this conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill be taken up out of order. I made an effort yesterday to get it printed under the rule, but was unable to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] asks unanimous consent that the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill be taken up for consideration now.

Mr. WALSH. I object

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes in connection with the request of the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. I am going to object, unless we can have order, so that we can hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. All gentlemen will take their seats. We can not transact business in a bedlam.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that we present a complete agreement except upon three items. One item is the half-and-half provision, the second item involves the half-and-half question, and the third is the Keller item, which has been rejected by the House so many times. With those exceptions we have a complete agreement. The conferees reported back these items involving the half-and-half for the instruction of the House. The Keller item is one which the conferees on the part of the House have repeatedly rejected, and the House has never accepted it. We can discuss these items in a very few minutes and then take a vote upon that. In a general way your conferees did not agree to any of the major Senate amendments. We did agree to a great many increases in the smaller salaries of clerks in the District government. We did agree to an increase in the appropriation for the Gallinger Hospital. With that exception the agreement, and the one in reference to the emergency war fund, where the Senate asked for something like $300,000 and your conferees compromised that matter, the Senate receded. I am stating this so that the gentleman from Massachusetts may be informed about what we have done that he may determine whether he will give unanimous consent or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes in support of the request of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, we are within two days of the close of the fiscal year. There are five of the general appropriation bills still in conference. One of these five is the District appropriation bill. It is not a complete report. It is absolutely necessary, as the older Members know, that the enrolling clerks should have time in order to enroll these bills before midnight of Sunday if they are to be passed before the close of the fiscal year. There is a tentative agreement that we are to take a recess. If the resolution was in force that we should adjourn by a certain day, then, under the rules of the House, within the last six days of the adjournment it would not be necessary to print conference reports in the RECORD, but on presentation they could be taken up for consideration.

There is an exigent reason, which we must recognize, that in these two closing days before the close of the fiscal year, if we are going to have enrolled these general appropriation bills, which are necessary to be passed before midnight of the coming Sunday, that these bills should be passed expeditiously.

The bill offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is a bill of considerable importance. It consists of over 100 pages. It will take considerable time to have that enrolled, even if it was a complete report, which it is not. The sundry civil bill contains over 200 pages, which will take the enrolling clerks more than a day, working day and night, to enroll. The military appropriation bill is a large bill. The naval appropriation bill is a lengthy bill. All of these bills are still in disagreement. I only rise to impress upon the House the advisability of granting consent, in these closing days, unless there is some real reason why the report should be printed in the RECORD, to have the conference report taken up for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the District of Columbia bill, the rule to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we have already considered one conference report without an accompanying statement, namely, the report on the Post Office appropriation bill, in accordance with the rule. This conference report contains action on something like 270 amendments, several of which are of considerable importance. They have been receded from by one branch or the other and certainly we ought to have some statement in the RECORD as to the changes that have been made. The gentleman from Wisconsin has been here a goodly number of years and he understands, of course, that there is another branch of this legislative machinery, and he is very credulous indeed if he thinks that by our agreeing to this unanimous consent it is going to facilitate matters, especially in view of what took place in another body yesterday. I think the report ought to be printed under the rule, and for the present I object.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report under the rule for printing in the RECORD.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 717).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 16, 17, 18, 19, 24, 31, 33, 34, 40, 42, 52, 56, 57, 59, 60, 64, 65, 70, 72, 78, 151, 154, 155, 156, 157, 166, 168, 170, 171, 172, 173, 176, 177, 178, 179, 181, 190, 192, 212, 220, 228, 231, 238, 239, 245, 248, 259, 262, 264, 267, 269, 274, and 276.

Amendment numbered 224: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 224, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$6,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 225: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 225, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$6,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 229: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 229, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$67,640"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 233: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 233, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 234: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 234, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 235: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 235, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$18,200"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 237: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 237, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$171,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 247: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 247, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$53,040"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 249: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 249, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$95,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 250: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 250, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$197,040"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 254: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 254, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "five"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 256: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 256, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,080"; and the Senate agree to the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4274. An act providing for the establishment of the Port of San Juan, customs district of Porto Rico, as a port of entry for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7237. An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 12000. An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

On June 27, 1918:

H. J. Res. 70. Joint resolution authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States;

H. R. 11185. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

S. 4557. An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes; and

S. 3391. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed to G. H. Beckwith for certain land within the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont.

On June 28, 1918:

H. R. 8563. An act to amend the homestead law in its application to Alaska, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 7237. An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes;

H. R. 9506. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 10358. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes;

H. R. 9641. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 10924. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 10843. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 11658. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 12000. An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

RELINQUISHMENT OF LONG AND SHORT LINE RAILROADS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a request for unanimous consent. Under the railroad control bill the President has until the 1st day of July, 1918, to relinquish any railroad line, long or short line, without the consent of the owners. That time will elapse on Sunday night next. The Railroad Administration has sent up a joint resolution to extend the time for relinquishment of all railroads until January 1, 1919, and the committee has reported the resolution with an amendment. Unless it is adopted to-morrow it will be too late to be available. I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to take up and consider this resolution after the reading and approval of the Journal to-morrow. It will only take a few minutes to act on it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that House joint resolution 303 may be taken up to-morrow after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table and the conference reports. Is there objection?

Mr. NOLAN. I object.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS, COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report (No. 720) from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 403.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ such additional assistant clerks as may be necessary during the 10 days next following the passage of this resolution, the payment of services not to exceed the sum of $250, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE POST-OFFICE MESSENGERS.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution (H. Rept. No. 719) from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 404.

Resolved, That the postmaster of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to continue the employment of 18 messengers, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, at the rate of $160 per month each from and after the 1st day of July, 1918, during the remainder of the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, this is simply the continuation of the employment of the session messengers of the House post office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think some explanation should be given by the gentleman in respect to this resolution, which gives continuous employment to session employees of the House post office.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, the fiscal year ends on the 30th of June, and they are provided with pay only until that time. The Committee on Accounts must provide for them out of the contingent fund until the Committee on Appropriations can look after the matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. I may not have caught the full import of the reading of the resolution, but, as I understand it, it is to continue these session employees on the roll under further order by the House.

Mr. PARK. No; only during the session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. EAGAN, for two days, on account of important business;

To Mr. LANGLEY, for two days, on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. The request of Mr. EAGAN should be dated as of yesterday.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

Mr. SPEAKER: I was sick in bed Wednesday, June 26, and therefore was not present in the House that day. I ask unanimous consent to be excused for my absence on that date.

E. S. CANDLER.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

MIGRATORY BIRDS—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 669).

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill S. 1553, to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the conference report upon the migratory-bird bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, and 5, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided, That no person who is subject to the draft for service in the Army or Navy shall be exempted or excused from such service by reason of his employment under this act"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 12. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the breeding of migratory game birds on farms and preserves and the sale of birds so bred under proper regulation for the purpose of increasing the food supply."

And the House agree to the same.

H. D. FLOOD,
CHAS. M. STEDMAN,
HENRY ALLEN COOPER,
Managers on the part of the House.

M. A. SMITH,

H. C. LODGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed upon:

The Senate receded from its disagreement to House amendments Nos. 1, 2, and 5.

The Senate receded from its disagreement to No. 3 with an amendment. The first proviso of No. 3 prohibited the expenditure of appropriation for the publication purposes. The amendment agreed upon was the second proviso, which prohibits the employment or exemption of any person under the provisions of this act who is subject to draft by the Army or Navy.

The Senate receded from its disagreement to amendment No. 4 with an amendment. The amendment No. 4 was a new section and stated that one of the objects of the bill was to foster the breeding of migratory game birds for food purposes. The amendment agreed upon is a new section providing that nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the breeding of migratory game birds or sale of birds so bred for food purposes.

H. D. FLOOD,
CHAS. M. STEDMAN,
HENRY ALLEN COOPER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I am not just clear as to the action of the Senate upon amendment No. 3. The statement says that the Senate recedes from its disagreement to amendment No. 3 with an amendment. The first proviso prohibited the expenditure for publications, bulletins, and magazines. That is stricken out?

Mr. FLOOD. That portion is stricken out.

Mr. WALSH. And the only prohibition is against the employment of persons within the draft age?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. And the language of that was changed so as to prohibit the employment or exemption of any person under the provisions of this act who is subject to the draft by the Army or Navy.

Mr. WALSH. Then, as I understand it, this department can publish a weekly bulletin of its activities, if it so desires, under the provisions of this act.

Mr. FLOOD. It has not done so, and the Senators insisted that it never would do so and that it was useless restriction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BURNETT). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

FOURTH LIBERTY LOAN.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12580) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12580, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the bill is very short, and I think it ought to be reported.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, is hereby further amended by striking out the figures "$12,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$20,000,000,000."

SEC. 2. That section 2 of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, is hereby further amended by striking out the figures "$5,500,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$7,000,000,000."

SEC. 3. That notwithstanding the provisions of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, or of the War Finance Corporation act, bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States payable in any foreign money or foreign moneys, and bonds of the War Finance Corporation payable in any foreign money or foreign moneys exclusively or in the alternative, shall, if and to the extent expressed in such bonds at the time of their issue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, while beneficially owned by a nonresident alien individual, or by a foreign corporation, partnership, or association, not engaged in business in the United States, be exempt both as to principal and interest from any and all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority.

SEC. 4. That any incorporated bank or trust company designated as a depositary by the Secretary of the Treasury under the authority conferred by section 8 of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, which gives security for such deposits as, and to amounts, by him prescribed, may, upon and subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, act as a fiscal agent of the United States in connection with the operations of selling and delivering any bonds, certificates of indebtedness, or war savings certificates of the United States.

SEC. 5. That the short title of this act shall be "Fourth liberty bond act."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this is the fourth liberty bond act. As I said, when we presented the third liberty bond act, we need not discuss the necessity or the wisdom for the further authorization of bonds. We all recognize the absolute necesssity. This bill provides for increasing the bond authorization of the second liberty bond act as amended by the third liberty bond act from $12,000,000,000 to $20,000,000,000. It simply strikes out the figures "$12,000,000,000" and inserts the figures "$20,000,000,000." It increases the appropriation for loans to the allies provided in the second liberty bond act as amended by the third liberty bond act from $5,500,000,000 to $7,000,000,000.

The estimates of expenditures for the next fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, are $24,000,000,000. If we grant that the revenue yield from the new revenue act, together with the revenues received from existing laws, will amount to $8,000,000,000, we have then $16,000,000,000 that must be financed for the next fiscal year by bonds. We have now authorized and available to be issued and sold $4,000,000,000 of bonds under the third liberty bond act. Taxes will be $8,000,000,000, providing we raise that much from the new revenue bill and existing law, and it is going to be difficult to get that amount; but granting we get it, it still leaves $12,000,000,000 to be provided for. Then there must be, in order to finance the war expenditures and current expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $12,000,000,000 of bonds additional to the bonds now authorized. In this bill we only authorize $8,000,000,000 additional, and no doubt the first of next session or next year we will have to come to you for another authorization of bonds.

Section 3 simply provides that the bonds we issue payable in foreign money, if owned by nonresident alien individuals or by foreign corporations not engaged in business in the United States, shall be exempt from all taxes, State and Federal. That is evidently what we must do; every other country in the world does it in order to sell their bonds in foreign countries.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, if this bill passes, which it will, of course, and you get $8,000,000,000 out of this new revenue bill, then what proportion of the sum total is going to be bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Thirty-three and a third per cent will be from taxes and 66⅔ from bonds.

Mr. GARNER. What the Speaker had in mind was probably at the end of the fiscal year 1919, what would then be the proportion of money raised by taxation and money borrowed by the Government expended in the war, and that would be greater than 33⅓ per cent, because up to the present time it has been more than 40 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have issued so far $10,000,000,000 of bonds, in round numbers, and we expect to raise $4,000,000,000 in taxes during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Does this change in any wise the rate of interest?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not at all. No change is made in the rate of interest, no change is made in the existing bond acts, except in the amount of authorization of bonds and the appropriations to the allies except in the particular which I have just mentioned in section 3 with reference to the purchase in a foreign country by nonresident alien individuals or by foreign corporations who do not do business here.

Mr. TILSON. We have seen statements in the papers——

Mr. KITCHIN. Such bonds while beneficially owned by those foreign corporations or nonresident alien individuals will not be subject to any State or Federal tax.

Mr. TILSON. There has been some statement in financial papers that probably the next issue would require 4½ per cent in order to float them. The gentleman does not anticipate any such difficulty?

Mr. KITCHIN. It will be the same rate of interest, 4¼. It is thought by the Treasury Department there will be no difficulty in making the sale on those terms.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. KEARNS. After this bill is passed, then what will be the aggregate amount of money authorized from the sale of bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman means sold and authorized together?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Twenty-two billion dollars of bonds and, in addition, $2,000,000,000 of war-savings certificates.

Mr. KEARNS. Is this $7,000,000,000 mentioned in this bill to be taken out of the $24,000,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that is taken out. The $7,000,000,000 to which the gentleman refers simply increases the authority to loan the allies one and a half billion dollars, from $5,500,000,000 up to $7,000,000,000. I will say to the House that up to yesterday we had loaned our allies $5,594,000,000.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. What collateral do we receive from the allies—their bonds in exchange?

Mr. KITCHIN. In exchange on the same terms and tenure that our bonds are.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. FESS. Is that fixed in the law, or is that left to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the rate is 4¼ per cent; that is fixed in the original law, and this bill is simply an amendment to the second liberty bond act as amended by the third liberty bond act.

Mr. FESS. So the rate of interest is not left to the latitude of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. The statement the gentleman made as to the same rate and tenor of our obligations——

Mr. KITCHIN. The same terms.

Mr. SLOAN. It is the same as to the interest——

Mr. KITCHIN. And the same as to when payable and the convertibility.

Mr. SLOAN. I call attention to what the representative of the Treasury Department said; are not they carrying entirely short-term obligations from these other countries instead of——

Mr. KITCHIN. It was contemplated that these short-term bonds, and it was agreed by the foreign governments that these short-term bonds, would be converted into long-time bonds, conforming to the terms of our bonds.

Mr. SLOAN. And none of that has been done yet?
Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know.
Mr. SLOAN. Now, one other question, so as to develop this: The element of convertibility is in no wise to be in this issue?
Mr. KITCHIN. No; because this is an amendment of the third liberty bond act.
Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.
Mr. KEARNS. Of the $24,000,000,000 of bonds and war-savings certificates that will be authorized if this bill becomes a law, what amount has been already sold?
Mr. KITCHIN. About $10,000,000,000 of bonds and $291,000,000 of war-savings and thrift stamps.
Mr. BANKHEAD. If it is a proper question, I would like to inquire the total amount of the loans to the Russian Government.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On page 2 of the report the gentleman will find it.
Mr. KITCHIN. The total loans to Russia are $187,729,750. Now, the papers have stated that it is $325,000,000; but that was a credit established to that amount, and according to this report we have loaned Russia $187,729,750.
Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the period of these bonds, 30 or 40 years, for which this issue is authorized?
Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think we put a limit in the bond issue in that respect. But the foreign bonds are going to have the same limit of time and other terms as our own.
Mr. BANKHEAD. That is left to the Secretary of the Treasury?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but the law requires they must be the same terms as to interest and time as provided in our bonds.
Mr. KEARNS. Do not the bonds always have a limit as to time of payment?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but in the bond act we left it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.
Mr. FOSTER. Now, as to section 3, does this provision apply to bonds already issued and purchased by residents of foreign countries?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; if they are beneficially owned by a nonresident alien individual or a foreign corporation not doing business in this country. If an alien individual lives here or a foreign corporation does business here, bonds held by them are subject to taxes just as bonds held by a citizen of the United States.
Mr. FOSTER. It would apply to the bonds already bought?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it applies only to those bonds payable in foreign money——
Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the chairman of the committee please state now or later on the amount of money thus far loaned to various governments and the amount proposed in this bill to loan to the same governments?
Mr. KITCHIN. We have appropriated $8,500,000,000 under the three war-bond acts for the purpose of extending credit to our allies, and to date we have extended credits to them amounting to $5,594,000,000. We authorize in this bill an additional appropriation of $1,500,000,000 to extend additional credits to our allies.
Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The nature of my question was the amount loaned to the several foreign governments.
Mr. KITCHIN. Up to now we have loaned Belgium $114,100,000; Cuba, $5,000,000; France, $1,645,000,000; Great Britain, $3,055,000,000; Italy, $580,000,000; Russia, $187,729,750; Serbia, $7,605,000.
Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Now, will the gentleman state, please, the amount proposed in this issue to loan to the several governments?
Mr. KITCHIN. This bill authorizes an additional loan of $1,500,000,000 to the allies.
Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. To the several governments individually, not the total?
Mr. KITCHIN. We leave that in the discretion of the President and the Secretary.
Mr. GORDON. Are we obligated to loan Russia any more money than that $187,000,000 that the gentleman spoke about?
Mr. KITCHIN. That is in the discretion of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, and I presume if they think it better for the war situation they will loan them, but they have not loaned them any money lately.
Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KITCHIN. I will.
Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman tell us what form of securities of these foreign governments we have taken in exchange for the loans we have made to them?
Mr. KITCHIN. No security except their obligation.
Mr. GILLETT. Have they given us regular bonds?
Mr. KITCHIN. I thought they were now converting those short-time notes or obligations into bonds, the long-time bonds, conformable to our bonds, which the statutes require. But the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] says they have not done that yet, but still have the short-time obligations. But it is agreed that all the governments will convert them into these long-time bonds upon demand, so far as I know. I may be mistaken.
Mr. GILLETT. You may be mistaken?
Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The reason is that they may have to adjust more satisfactory rates later on.
Mr. GILLETT. Do you mean that we have just the notes signed by the ambassadors?
Mr. KITCHIN. I think so, authorized by their governments.
Mr. GILLETT. I understand those were temporary, but that the Government was going to give us something more formal.
Mr. KITCHIN. That is what the statute requires, and I think they are going to do that.
Mr. MILLER of Washington. Can the gentleman state what Government of Russia has given us these securities?
Mr. KITCHIN. What Government?
Mr. MILLER of Washington. Yes.
Mr. KITCHIN. They change the government so often and so quickly over there that I do not know, but this was loaned several months ago.
Mr. FOSTER. Was not that loan made when the old government of the Czar was in power?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; some months ago.
Mr. MILLER of Washington. Then no loans have been made to Russia since the fall of the Empire?
Mr. KITCHIN. No, sir. That is my understanding.
Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?
Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.
Mr. PLATT. I want to ask the gentleman a question of an entirely different kind, not on bonds, but on war savings stamps. Under the first liberty bond act, or whichever one it was which authorized the sale of war savings stamps, there was a prohibition of the sale of more than $100 worth to one person at one time.
Mr. KITCHIN. I think the limit was a thousand dollars.
Mr. PLATT. No. No person could buy more than $1,000 worth in all, but it provided that no person could buy more than $100 worth at one time. I understand that has not been adhered to. I understand that the President bought $1,000 worth at one time. If that is so, why not take it out of the act?
Mr. KITCHIN. If the law so provides, and the President of the United States bought more than $100 worth at a time, then he violated the law, and he ought not to have done it. [Laughter.] If I had a chance I would advise him not to do it.
Mr. PLATT. Then he violated the law. [Laughter.]
Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.
Mr. GILLETT. I suppose this leaves the law the same as it now exists as to the amount that the Secretary of the Treasury is given for expenses in the floating of the bonds?
Mr. KITCHIN. Exactly. There is no increase.
Mr. GILLETT. Has the Secretary of the Treasury yet given to Congress any detailed account of those expenses in connection with the last bond sale?
Mr. KITCHIN. I really do not recall, but I have an indistinct recollection that after the little discussion here in the House in the last presentation of the bond issue a report was filed, but I really do not recall.
Mr. GILLETT. I have not been able to find it.
Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I think they have a report about ready to be filed.
Mr. GILLETT. About to be filed?
Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.
Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman another question?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.
Mr. GILLETT. Can the gentleman foresee, or has the administration informed him, when this next sale will probably take place?
Mr. KITCHIN. I understand it will take place some time in October.
Mr. GILLETT. Just at election time?
Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; when everybody is rich and able to buy bonds. [Laughter.]
Mr. GILLETT. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to wait until the campaign is over?
Mr. KITCHIN. Really, if you want my views about it, I will say that if Congress could get out on the 1st of October, when the Members could be in their districts and talk about bonds and about the war we could sell probably 50 per cent more bonds than we could at any other time in the year. I hope the gentleman and the Congress and the President of the United States will cooperate so as to allow us to get out and float liberty bonds in October.

Mr. GILLETT. And say a word for ourselves at the same time?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we should sink ourselves at such a time as this. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Referring again to the sale of thrift stamps, the law permits any one individual to buy $1,000 worth of war-savings stamps at one time, but only $100 worth of thrift stamps, so that if the President bought $1,000 worth of war-savings stamps he had the right to do so.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think by that statement the gentleman has explained it satisfactorily to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman tell me what percentage of the loans made to foreign countries has actually remained here, and what percentage has been sent over?

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that substantially all remained here.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Substantially all?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. It has remained here?

Mr. KITCHIN. Substantially all.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Not all?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say substantially all.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. Can the gentleman give me any figures as to the amount of bonds that are likely under this provision to be sold to foreign people? Has there been a considerable amount of bonds so sold?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. One reason why they could not sell them is that they would be subject to taxation, and if we were to issue them subject to taxation the foreigners might consider that Congress would put a tax on them, an income tax or an excess-profit tax or a surtax, so that there might be little profit in them and no investment for them.

Mr. SNOOK. Does the department think that with this provision in the bill they can be sold more readily?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. The department thinks they can sell them better.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Referring to the Russian loan, is it not true that of the $187,000,000 loaned, most of that fund, if not all of it, was used in the purchase of supplies, and that most of the supplies were stopped because of the fall of the Government?

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not quite catch that.

Mr. FESS. I understand that this loan to Russia was utilized in the purchase of supplies, and they were shipped to Vladivostok, and on the fall of the Government those supplies were estopped, so that the United States has possession of most of them yet.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know; but some of them were stopped in transit. The Government held up the contracts that were being performed.

Mr. FESS. It is not a total loss?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; not a total loss at all.

Now, the fourth section provides that the depositaries of the Treasury Department are made fiscal agents in the sale and delivery of Government obligations.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Can the gentleman state as to whether or not the Treasury Department has taken any steps to stabilize the bonds and prevent their being driven down below cost?

Mr. KITCHIN. They have taken some steps. I think when the War Finance Corporation is fully organized and begins operation seriously it will have some effect; yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Have they the power to step in?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but I doubt if they have done that yet.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give me leave to correct him?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Leffingwell says they have taken steps.

Mr. NOLAN. I wanted to find out what the Treasury Department has done to stop the depreciation of bonds that might be undertaken by the people.

Mr. KITCHIN. You mean under the last bond act?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Leffingwell stated that they have purchased some of the bonds, which had a tendency, in his opinion, to stabilize the market.

Mr. NOLAN. I had this in mind, that in going out among the people the Government desires to make these bond issues as popular as possible and have people buy them in small amounts. Sometimes people might buy them with the best intentions in the world and then be unable fully to pay for them, and in cases where they wanted to get rid of them, if they could show good and sufficient reasons for the need of that cash, and still get $500 or $1,000 worth of bonds, the sales could be made more readily.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said, the listed price of these bonds does not represent their full value. Just a few bonds can be put on the market and listed and manipulated for that purpose. I have not known of a man yet who got his bonds below par.

Mr. NOLAN. I do not think anybody who would give the thing any thought would be influenced by that, but in going out in our liberty loan campaigns it will be harder to induce the man who has a small amount of money to invest in the new issue if the first, second, and third liberty loan bonds are selling on the market below par.

Mr. KITCHIN. It will be more difficult to sell them.

Mr. NOLAN. And if in some way the small investor could be assured that in case of necessity he could secure the par value of his bonds it would obviate that difficulty.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have a provision now that the Government may buy so many a year. I am sure the people will be convinced that they can get par value for their bonds. I think whenever a man really needs the money, and is not putting his bonds on the market for the purpose of bearing the price, he can get his money dollar for dollar from the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I asked that question of Mr. Leffingwell, and he asked that his reply be not printed in the record of the committee hearings.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. That is the reason I did not make any statement about that. I will leave that to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under the war-finance corporation act they have bought some bonds, and Mr. Leffingwell stated that he believed that had a tendency to stabilize their value.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. My purpose in rising was to ask a question in line with the questions that have just been asked. I have observed that the price of the liberty bonds has fluctuated anywhere from par down to 93 and a fraction; some days they are 94, and the next day 95.

Mr. KITCHIN. They were 96 yesterday.

Mr. HELM. They are 96 now, but they have been as low as 93. Is there not some way of preventing these bonds from being listed on the Stock Exchange? It seems to me that if they are to be treated like copper stocks and steel stocks and railroad stocks, if they are to be manipulated by bull and bear movements, it will have an unwholesome effect on bond buyers; and it does seem to me that there ought to be some way of preventing these bonds from being listed on the New York Stock Exchange. I think some stocks are prohibited from being listed in such a way; and if there is any way that this can be done, it seems to me of vital importance. I should like to know whether the gentleman has ever considered that matter.

Mr. KITCHIN. That has been one of the difficult problems before the Treasury Department. They are considering the matter along the lines that the gentleman suggests, but they have not come to any conclusion as to what is the best policy to be pursued with respect to keeping these bonds at par, or as near to par as possible.

Mr. HELM. Is it not the opinion of the committee that if the governors of the New York Stock Exchange are requested by the proper officials not to permit these bonds to be listed on the exchange, that they are patriotic enough to comply with the request of the representatives of the Government?

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope so. I think the governors of the Stock Exchange would in all probability conduct themselves with respect to the matter as the Treasury Department desired if the department concluded that a certain policy should be adopted.

Mr. HELM. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that these wide fluctuations are due to manipulation;

Mr. KITCHIN. I assure the gentleman that the department is looking into that matter now.

Mr. REED. Along that same line, I have had suggestions from good citizens whether it would not be advisable to have a penalty attached to vicious profiteering in these bonds. Has that been considered?

Mr. KITCHIN. We considered that on the last bond bill. Of course, it would be hard to tell what was vicious profiteering; but, as I said, the officials of the Treasury Department are now trying to work out some tangible proposition with respect to that matter.

Mr. REED. A man who profiteers in the grocery business now is called to account for it. Could not a man who pays a lower price for these bonds be put in that same category?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am confident that the department is considering that question fully.

Mr. ROBBINS. Do these bonds carry the circulating privilege?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. ROBBINS. They are just like the others in that regard?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. But they are received as deposits?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. And for taxes?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Certificates of indebtedness are accepted in payment of taxes; in payment of estate or inheritance taxes. Now, I am going to ask Judge HULL to take charge of the bill from now on, because at 2 o'clock I shall have to be at a committee hearing.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield two or three minutes to me?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to make this observation: With the enactment into law of this bill, which is about to pass this House unanimously, we will have authorized a public debt of $24,000,000,000. It is interesting to note that the total public debt of Germany to-day is only about $1,000,000,000 more than that, or about $25,000,000,000. In other words, this Government in 15 months has authorized the creation of a public debt within $1,000,000,000 of the amount that Germany has authorized in 47 months. Since the beginning of the war the American people have authorized the expenditure of almost the amount of money that it has taken Germany to get by loans in three times that length of time. The first liberty loan was subscribed for by about 4,500,000 people, the second by about 9,500,000 people, this last loan by over 17,000,000 people. I venture to predict that the coming loan will be subscribed for by 30,000,000 people; and we are going on to issue more and more bonds, and American citizens in increasing numbers are going to buy them until we have conquered Germany. [Applause.] May I suggest that a good subtitle to this bill would be "Huns, take notice!" [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 2 of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, is hereby further amended by striking out the figures "$5,500,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$7,000,000,000."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I will vote for this bill, as will every Member of the House. I think it is extremely gratifying to know that following this bill we will have an opportunity to vote on another bill that will have to do with raising the money necessary to prosecute the war. The latter bill will provide for raising $4,000,000,000 by taxation levied on incomes and excess profits. This is in addition to the four billions now raised by taxation.

In common with every other Member of this House I have voted for all the bills which have been presented to the House authorizing liberty loans. My recollection is that on most of those bills we have not had a roll call, and my colleagues will bear witness to the fact that not a single vote has been cast against a bill authorizing a liberty loan.

I was therefore somewhat surprised to have my attention called to a statement that appeared in a newspaper in my district to the effect that I had opposed all of these liberty loans. As a rule, having been connected with the newspaper business all my life, I am not "thinskinned" in the matter of newspaper attacks, but this last charge was so flagrantly untrue that I felt justified in making a statement at this time, because every man within the sound of my voice is in a position to testify that the charge is totally false. [Applause.]

I have not only supported every liberty-loan bill but I have worked and voted for all other measures calculated to hasten the winning of the war.

Mr. Chairman, the newspaper which contained the libel to which I have referred is the Star-Journal, a daily newspaper published in my home city, Pueblo, Colo.

In its issue of June 2, 1918, it printed an alleged petition addressed to a citizen of Pueblo urging him to become a candidate for the seat I have the honor to occupy.

There were no names attached to the petition and the Star-Journal was careful to conceal the identity of the author.

I have it on good authority that the petition was circulated by Frank S. Hoag, editor and part owner of the Star-Journal, and that he pleaded for signatures, but with little success.

The petition contains what purports to be a review of my record as a Member of this House since the European war began, in August, 1914.

Of the many counts in this long indictment, just one is founded on fact. That has to do with my vote against war. Some of the others may be described as "half truths" and the remainder are lies manufactured out of whole cloth.

As an example of the latter, I will quote one paragraph from Mr. Hoag's petition as it appeared in the Star-Journal:

"He [referring to myself] opposed the liberty loans necessary to the prosecution of the war."

"He [referring to myself] opposed the liberty loan necessary

The fact is I voted for all three of the liberty loans, subscribed to the same to the extent of my financial ability, and while in Colorado last October actively participated in the second liberty loan campaign.

Of course Hoag and those associated with him were familiar with these facts. Yet they chose to deliberately and maliciously lie about me in the hope that their statements would be accepted as true by those of my constituents who are not in touch with the work of Congress.

As I have said, I had not intended to notice this canard, but I was informed yesterday that the more unscrupulous of my opponents were circulating the story and citing as evidence of its truth the fact that I had not publicly replied to the Star-Journal charge; hence this statement, which the House has been good enough to permit me to make.

Mr. Chairman, without taking more time of the House, I deside unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That notwithstanding the provisions of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, or of the War Finance Corporation act, bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States payable in any foreign money or foreign moneys, and bonds of the War Finance Corporation payable in any foreign money or foreign moneys exclusively or in the alternative, shall, if and to the extent expressed in such bonds at the time of their issue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, while beneficially owned by a nonresident alien individual, or by a foreign corporation, partnership, or association, not engaged in business in the United States, be exempt both as to principal and interest from any and all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. In fact, I have been in favor of every measure that has been passed by this House which I thought was calculated to bring us victory in the great struggle in which we are now engaged.

It is a very significant fact, and one that should be disheartening to the enemy, that all Members here, whether they were in favor of the original war resolution or not, are now, since the war is on, anxious to prosecute it with all vigor to a successful conclusion.

Mr. Chairman, in this Chamber there is not a dissenting voice to this bill; and it will not take one hour all told to pass it through this House by unanimous consent. Why this harmony of purpose and speed of action? Is it because the matter with which it deals is of little or no importance? No; it is because the teeth of the American people are set, and having once started they are willing to make any sacrifice in order to win. This measure authorizes the selling of $8,000,000,000 more of Government bonds. Have you ever stopped to consider how much this is? If this sum were all in one dollar bills attached end to end and side to side, it would constitute a band over 9 feet in width that would reach around the earth, and it would amount to more than $8 for every minute since the birth of Jesus Christ.

It has been said by some that the American people are a money-loving people. Be that as it may, we have shown in this crisis that there are considerations that we place above gold. Since we entered this war we have sold—or, at least, authorized to be sold—$22,000,000,000 worth of Government bonds. In addition to this, we raised for war purposes last year by the internal-revenue law $3,000,000,000, and this fiscal year, through our new internal-revenue law, we will raise eight billion more, thus making in all at least $32,000,000,000 pledged. Were this vast sum of money in $1 bills attached end to end and side by side it would produce a band over 36 feet in width that would reach over sea and land around the earth—a band of dollar bills wide enough and long enough for a public highway around the world, on which three automobiles could run abreast with ease. If this world is but 6,000 years old, as many claim, $32,000,000,000 is a sum so ponderous that it would amount to a little more than $10 for every minute of time since the great Creator, standing upon this new-created earth, breathed into man's nostrils his first breath of life.

Mr. Chairman, we have not been doing things in a half-hearted manner here in Washington; neither have the people been exhibiting anything but intense interest at home. Fervent speech and patriotic actions are everywhere in evidence. You all well know what the far West has been doing in the way of furnishing men and means with which to carry on the war, and as a sample of the public utterances out there which have encouraged our people to action, I wish to here quote and include as my own remarks a few extracts from the speech of M. G. Gallaher, of Fresno, Cal., delivered at the dedication of the Liberty Cemetery at Fresno, May 30, 1918:

"It is indeed a pleasure and an honor to participate in the exercises of this occasion. A most fitting time and a most fitting day is this, a day set apart for the commemoration of the achievements of the soldiers of the great war that established forever the United States of America an inseparable union, a fitting day on which to do this deed of charity and of patriotism that we have met to perform.

"Fidelity of the citizen to his own country has ever been a marked virtue. Patriotic devotion to the principles of our American institutions is in these stressful times a special virtue. Our country has had a matchless history. Born of the fight of our forefathers for freedom and the struggles and sacrifices of brave men and women; reunited and its union cemented with the blood of patriots in a great civil war; rededicated 20 years ago to the proposition that all men are equal, and its principles carried to a distressed and oppressed people; with a history of progress and development unequaled in any country in any age, it is but natural that we at this time of the world's greatest crisis feel a solemn and deep sense of patriotism that impels us to make every sacrifice that may be necessary to carry our flag to another triumph.

A YEAR AGO.

"But little more than one year ago our country was at peace; all Europe was engaged in a great struggle between the principle of the equality of men and the right on the one hand, and special privilege, might, and tyranny on the other. The representative officers of our great Nation believed that it was possible for our country to pass through this age of transformation, revolution, and reconstruction without the sacrifice of our treasure, of our blood, and of our men. The American people going forward in the march of progress and material development believed and prayed that we might be saved from our part in the great struggle for humanity, but 'There is a Divinity that shapes our ends.'

"Without recounting the causes that impelled us to go to war, the American people now believe that it was our destiny to carry our flag of freedom on to the battle fields of Europe in the cause of mankind. Since that time there has been a transformation in the sentiments, in the hopes, and in the aspirations and in the patriotism of the people of the United States of America. Turning from the all-absorbing business of accumulating money, creating property, and providing for the material welfare of our people, we have engaged in the altruistic business of devoting the God-given resources of our country, our money, our property, and our man power to this great cause. Without murmur or complaint, the great captains of industry of our country have mobilized their instrumentalities of production into the service of the country; the railroad magnates have cheerfully turned over to the common cause the means of transportation of the country so essential to the successful prosecution of the one great business in which we are engaged. More important still, the great army of laborers of the United States of America who toil with their hands to provide for themselves and their families are giving of their earnings in large proportion patriotically and devotedly to the great common cause of our country and to the cause of humanity. More beautiful, if not, indeed, more important, patriotic women of the country have organized themselves into a great mobilized force of labor, of production, and of charity, and through the Red Cross, the Y. W. C. A., and the various women of the civilian war organizations of the country they stand behind the men who have gone forward to serve, to do battle, if need be to die, that our country may live. But most important and beyond all these evidences of devotion, 10,000,000 of our young men between the ages of 21 and 31 years have uncomplainingly and courageously submitted to their country's command and are giving their services, their blood, their limbs, and their lives in this holy cause.

NO LOOKING BACK.

"America has put her hand to the plow; she will not look back. Ever forward, until victory shall have crowned our devotion and our sacrifices, shall be the watchword of America. Taxes must be raised and the people will cheerfully pay them. Money must be loaned to the Government, and three times have we gone over the top, and we shall go over the top at every call of our country. The sick and the wounded and dying must be cared for and the ministrations of the Red Cross and of kindred societies will not cease so long as the American Army stands at the front as a barrier against the onslaught of the hordes of the Hun. Three million fathers and mothers have already pressed the hand of the patriotic son who marched away to fight for us; 2,000,000 strong, stalwart Americans have already gone forward into training. Sixteen cities of devoted patriots have been builded in the United States of America. From these have already gone forth more than a million men across the ocean to make, if necessary, the utmost sacrifice for us. Just now thousands are upon the submarine-infested seas, going forth to face the dangers, the disasters, of cruel and barbarous war; just now in once beautiful, but now devastated, France more than a million Americans stand facing the guns of the enemy; just now, with all the accumulated preparation and determination of the past 50 years concentrated on the battle line in Europe, stand the millions of the minions of the house of Hohenzollern and the house of Hapsburg; just now the last titanic struggle of autocracy for perpetual supremacy over democracy is on; just now out on 'no man's land' American soldiers lie wounded and dying; just now millions of mothers in the United States wait and watch, amidst work in the cause, to know what has been the fate of a dear son; just now all America waits breathless the tidings that shall tell whether that line of men who have stood like a stone wall between civilization and barbarous militarism for three years past shall be broken and destroyed or whether the matchless bravery and fearful fighting qualities of the Briton, the Australian, the Canadian, the valiant Frenchman, and the matchless American shall bring victory at this time and once for all stay the iron hand of tyranny in its ruthless destruction of all that is dear and all that is of value in the world.

THE UNRETURNING.

"We know that thousands and tens of thousands of those who go forth to fight will return with empty sleeve, on crutches, with blinded eye, and diseased body. We know that thousands and tens of thousands of those who have gone forth to battle for our country and for us will never return. We know that on 'no man's land,' in the trenches, on the once vine-clad hills but now barren wastes of western France will sleep the heroes of our flag. We know that beneath the rolling waves of the ocean now sleep those who have gone down to an untimely death by the ruthless, barbarous warfare of the Hun. We know that some time the sacred bodies of those who lay down their lives in France will be taken up from the graves that are now cared for by the loving hands of the devoted women of France, and returned to the sacred soil of their native land. Time was when love had no place in the councils of war, but this is a holy war; it is a war for humanity and all that men and women hold dear; and in the midst of preparation, in the midst of our sacrifices, we do not forget the tender cords of love that bind father and mother to son and friend to friend; we do not forget that greater and grander love that goes out to all of our soldiers and to those who die for us. How fitting, then, the exercises of this day; how, then, in harmony with the spirit, the sentiment, of patriotism and altruism it is that the B'nai B'rith has given this beautiful ground for the last resting place of those who lay down their lives in their country's defense; how fitting that the city of Fresno accepts this ground to be dedicated as the place that our soldiers in that war shall rest and sleep the long, long sleep of the dead. How sweet the thought that those who go from our city and county and give their lives for us shall sometime mingle their dust with the loved soil of their own Edenic California.

THE TOLL OF BATTLE.

"We wish that all those who have gone and all those who will yet go from our midst might return, yet we know that lives must be sacrificed and that our boys with the innumerable hosts from other parts of our loved land must make their share of the last sacrifice. If among them there be those that the sea will not give up, or whose last resting place shall be found in the barren waste of the battle fields of a far-off country, they shall have their place here and a stone will tell the story; and after a while, to the fathers and mothers, the brothers and sisters and loved ones who have given their treasure, the life of the dear one, in this great cause, in the solemn moments when the vacant place at the table shall bring back in tremendous force the memories of their kindliness at home and their devotion to their country's cause, this will be a sacred and solemn retreat—solemn, indeed, but a place of joy. Under the shade of the trees planted by loving hands, midst the blooming flowers of our own California, to the quiet walks and drives in this sacred place, they will come—and what a place for meditation this will be! Aged mothers here will again hear the prattle of the child who once twined its arms about her neck, that she so often sang to sleep with her lullaby songs; here in memory's ear she will again hear the first formed words of her child; here the playful pranks and childish mischief of her loved one will come back to her with the force of reality; here she will again, with her boy, in memory, recount his joys, his sorrows, his disappointments, and his triumphs of each day; here the aged father and mother will again, with memory's eye, see the buoyant youth—the treasure of their hearts, the hope of their life—grown to manhood, stalwart and strong, with set jaw and determined face, press their hands and take his place in the line of march with the stream of young American manhood, going forth to the great battle fields of Europe; here again the hopes and aspirations of a father's and mother's love will wonder at the fortune of the son; here again in memory's ear they will hear the call of their country and the answer of their son; and here they will live again the anxious hours, days, weeks, and months of waiting for tidings from the son; and here again they will hear the story that he has given his life that his country and ours might live.

"This will be a place at once of sadness and of solemn joy—sadness that their hopes for an ambitious son were blighted by his death—joy that he once lived and that they could give and he could give a precious life in a holy cause. Here they will again witness the transformation and reconstruction of the principles of government and of nations. Here, contemplating the triumph of right through the sacrifice of a son, and the millions of sons, who were sacrificed in this titanic struggle, what seemed but cruel loss will be a solemn joy. Here fathers and mothers and young men and women and children as well will drink from the fountains of patriotism and dedicate themselves to the principles for which our heroes died.

CONSECRATED GROUND.

"We honor the mayor of our city for the plan that culminates in this dedication; we thank the Liberty Cemetery committee and its chairman for the execution in so fine fashion of the plan; we thank the patriotic benevolent society that donated this ground to be beautified and dedicated to this holy purpose; we thank the labor unions of Fresno for the labor that beautifies the sacred spot; we honor all those Americans who patriotically devoted their energies to the great cause in which we are engaged; we honor the fathers and mothers who are giving their sons for the defense of our country; we honor our heroes in the camp and on the ocean and in France, who fight our battles. We give our cheers, our gratitude and tears to the soldiers who have given their lives and those who will yet give their lives for our flag, for what it represents and for humanity. To them we dedicate this Liberty Cemetery. To us they consecrate this ground."

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say, with such unity on the part of the members of the American Congress, and with such sentiments as above expressed on the part of the people at home, I submit that the evil days of oppression and of the oppressor are numbered, and soon a new and glorious dawn will lighten the horizon of mankind.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have not and will not oppose any revenue measure necessary to raise sufficient money to enable our Government to properly and efficiently conduct this war. It is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury our expenditures this coming year will be $24,000,000,000. However, included in that sum are loans that we expect to make to our allies, in round numbers $6,000,000,000. Our loans may exceed $6,000,000,000 within the next year to our allies, or it may not quite reach that sum.

I differ with a great many gentlemen here as to the amount of money that should be raised by direct taxes; that is to say, I differ as to the amount in proportion to our total expenditures. We anticipate that foreign governments to whom we are loaning money, which are engaged on the same side of the war we are, will pay back to the United States Government all the money that we are loaning to them, together with a rate of interest equal to the rate that we pay on our Government bonds that we are disposing of to get the money to loan to them. Therefore it is my understanding that the foreign nations will take care of the amount of money we are loaning them. It is my candid opinion that we should not raise by taxation any money which we are loaning to the allies. We should obtain that money from the sale of Government bonds which, under the law, must be of the exact length of time that foreign government bonds issued to our country for these loans will run.

Therefore, let me repeat: We expect foreign governments to pay back the $6,000,000,000 we are loaning them the coming fiscal year, and I do not believe at a time when prices are abnormally high all over the world we should tax our people now for that money, but should raise a reasonable amount of money necessary for our own Government to carry on this war. Therefore it is estimated that our expenditures, not including any portion of our loans, will be $18,000,000,000.

Now, it is proposed that we raise by taxation this coming year $8,000,000,000. That is more than 40 per cent of the estimated total expenditures. No country in the world ever raised such a sum or percentage by taxation during the time of war. No country in the world to-day is raising 30 per cent of their expenditures. Great Britain this year estimates that she will receive from taxation 28 per cent of her expenditures; from the beginning of the war to the end of the last fiscal year she raised by taxes 25.7 per cent. Canada has raised by taxation 18.5 per cent of her expenditures. France has raised 11 per cent and Italy 9 per cent, and we are proposing to raise by taxation about 45 per cent of our expenditures. When there is but $60,000,000,000 in the United States, for us to raise $8,000,000,000 by taxation, I want to say to you that it is a question of great seriousness as to what the industrial interests of the country are going to do for money when that great volume of money is to be called into the Treasury of the United States in taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. If this war is for anything, it is for the future peace of the world. Therefore, the future generations are going to enjoy what we are fighting for to-day. To send our men to the trenches to fight this great war and offer up their lives, if necessary, and at the same time call upon the people of this country to pay as we go for this war is more than any other government in any country in the world ever asked of their people. During the Civil War for every dollar raised by taxation we borrowed $5.09.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan give us some idea of what he thinks we ought to raise by direct taxation and by bond issue to meet our own actual war expenses?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. I believe that one-third would be the maximum amount that we should raise—one-third of the money that it will require for us to meet our war expenses and other governmental expenditures.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman would eliminate the money that we loaned to our allies?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, absolutely, from the taxes. I believe, as I have said, perhaps before the gentleman came into the Chamber, that we should not raise by taxation one cent that we are loaning to these foreign governments, because they are going to take care of that, we expect, and meet the payment of interest upon that sum. Therefore it is not proper now—there is no justification now—for taxing our people for money we are loaning to foreign governments that we expect them to pay in 20 or 30 years from now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a part of the administration's program to raise $2 by taxation for the year ending June 30, 1919, for every $1 raised during the present year?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, taxation is to be doubled.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is proposed in this new tax law that we are now working on that we shall double up the income of the Government this coming year over our present year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. By taxation.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; in round numbers we shall raise $8,000,000,000 of taxes, whereas it is estimated that we will collect this fiscal year, just about closing, a little more than $4,000,000,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman perhaps heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] state that we had raised by bond issue $24,000,000,000 and England had raised twenty-five billion. Does the gentleman think that is a fair comparison, because we have loaned England three and one-half billion dollars, and she would naturally have had twenty-eight billion dollars and a half?

Mr. FORDNEY. Those figures are incorrect. Great Britain's total expenditure from the beginning of the war until the end of their last fiscal year, the 31st of March, is $33,000,000,000; but that runs over a period of three and a half years, while we have been in the war only 15 months.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of having the RECORD correct, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] did not make that statement with reference to Great Britain, but with reference to Germany.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I thought he said Great Britain.

Mr. FORDNEY. Germany's expenditures in this war are almost equal to those of Great Britain, I believe.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The comparison of what we can do for a dollar with what Germany can do for a dollar would be unfair. It takes $11 for us to do what Germany can do with $1.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know anything about the correctness of figures in respect to Germany, and I do not believe anyone knows what is happening behind the German lines.

Mr. ALEXANDER. As I understood the gentleman's statement, Mr. LONGWORTH stated that Germany's indebtedness was $25,000,000,000, but that was not her total expenditure. That was her indebtedness represented by bond issues.

Mr. FORDNEY. Thank you. I received a letter written by the American ambassador in London, England, dated April 25, and he states that Great Britain's cost of this war to that date was $33,000,000,000. He gives the amount in pounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That any incorporated bank or trust company designated as a depositary by the Secretary of the Treasury under the authority conferred by section 8 of the second liberty-bond act, as amended by the third liberty-bond act, which gives security for such deposits as, and to amounts, by him prescribed, may, upon and subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, act as a fiscal agent of the United States in connection with the operations of selling and delivering any bonds, certificates of indebtedness, or war-savings certificates of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I wish to inquire of some gentleman upon the committee as to the purpose of this section 4. I notice that authorization was granted to the Secretary of the Treasury in section 8 of the second liberty bond act, referred to in this bill, to designate certain banks as depositories. What is the purpose of this amendment to that section?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. This simply gives the Treasury the right to impose certain restrictions on these banking concerns with respect to the selling and delivering of bonds. Under the law as it is operated some concerns have taken the money and have undertaken to conduct these operations for individual purchasers, and in the meantime they have gotten in a bad way financially, with the result that the purchasers suffered losses. The Government does not want anything of that kind to come between the purchaser and the Government, so far as this class of business institutions is concerned, and it only seeks to impose certain safeguards or requirements that will avoid that in the future.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in the morning paper it is stated that the flotation of the next liberty loan would be exclusively through banks and trust companies. Was that a correct statement of the position of the Treasury Department?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Oh, no; not at all. It must have had reference to the placing of some of these certificates of indebtedness in anticipation of the bond loan.

Mr. STAFFORD. It had reference to this section 4 in seeking to give some explanation as to its import.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. It must have been a misapprehension, because I have stated the situation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the section mean a little more than the gentleman from Tennessee has stated? Does it not mean that the Secretary of the Treasury can require any bank which has deposits to act as a selling agent?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Well, the word "shall" was stricken out and the word "may" inserted, if the gentleman remembers on that point.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, as the gentleman from Wisconsin said, section 8 covers the matter of the power of the Secretary to make deposits, but this goes a little further. I think it fair to say this, so that the banks might understand the situation. This goes a little further, in that if a bank does not cheerfully and cordially act as a selling agent and does not come up to the Secretary's standard in that regard he may withdraw the deposits.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Well, the original language undoubtedly went further than the present language, because the word "shall" was stricken out in line 24 and the word "may" inserted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, this gives the Secretary a little more authority over the banks than he has had heretofore.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. To safeguard the purchases through the bank.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question. Why is the bank and trust company limited to one that is already designated as a Government depository by the Secretary of the Treasury? Now, there are a large number of national banks and trust companies which are in the Federal Reserve System that are not Government depositories. Why should not the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to use the banks which are not Government depositories if they desire to act as the fiscal agent of the Government in the sale of these bonds?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. If they desire to act, they can qualify and become depositories of the Government. This is only intended to deal with that class of institutions which the Government has relations with as depositories under section 8 of the second liberty bond act.

Mr. ROBBINS. Of course, to become a Government depository the bank must acquire and must have Government bonds as a guaranty of the safe-keeping of the funds deposited of the Government and their return at the proper time when demanded.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes; the Government would prefer that banks qualify in this way before undertaking to deal with them in connection with the provisions of section 4 that we are considering.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I may say that in the operation of the last liberty loan the Treasury Department designated many banks and trust companies other than those in the Federal Reserve System. Any bank that would assume the obligation of selling bonds would have the privilege of having the moneys deposited in its vaults until demanded by the Treasury Department, and would be designated as a United States depository. This section does not intend to limit the privilege to those banks only in the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. ROBBINS. No; but it does intend to limit it to those that are Government depositories.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Treasury Department has designated all these banks as United States depositories that took part in the flotation of the last liberty loan and will designate additional banks as United States depositories that assume that obligation in future flotations.

Mr. ROBBINS. If they acquire Government bonds as a guaranty——

Mr. STAFFORD. If they would act as an agent of the Government in the sale of subsequent liberty loans.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I have been out of the House on committee duty, and this is my first appearance while this bill has been considered. Section 2 says:

That section 2 of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, is hereby further amended by striking out the figures "$5,500,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$7,000,000,000."

Now, as I understand it, speaking hastily in glancing over it, touching the question of the taxes of the proposed fourth liberty loan act, it leaves them without change.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. It leaves the present law intact.

Mr. CANNON. With no change whatever?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Not from the former liberty loan act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I assume that it requires no averment on the part of any Member of the House to have it well understood that we are all standing sturdily in support of any and all measures that will aid in bringing a successful conclusion to this great conflict. But in the midst of this debate it occurred to me that it might be well, if possible, to arouse some consideration of an outstanding feature of this bond issue and of the sale of war-savings stamps by the Government. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] says that we have issued securities or obligated ourselves for $24,000,000,000. That might seem a staggering sum if we were now called upon to expend an additional $24,000,000,000 without results from the first $24,000,000,000; but, as I believe, that is merely an authorization and not an expenditure, and that the war situation has not fully felt the momentum of that $24,000,000,000; in fact, only in small part. We are only now beginning to assemble the strength of the Nation, and later on the effect, we are sure, will overwhelm our enemies. But what I really wished to speak of at this moment was that while at my home county—Union County, Pa.—I found with pardonable pride that this county held the country's record for the sale of war-savings stamps, and the record was made without any great expense to the Government. But I wish to call the attention of the House to what I found in an interior village during a recent canvass before the primary election. I saw there a man's cellar packed with literature which had been sent him from here or from Philadelphia, wherever the headquarters of the savings stamps campaign is located. His parlor and back porch were also filled with literature sufficient to give a thousand pieces to every individual in that part of the country where he was to sell these stamps. Such an absurdity, such a grave wastefulness, I think, gentlemen, is worthy of your consideration, and there should be in some manner a check put upon this orgy of expenditure and something done about it. Since we are all eating black bread, paying war taxes, and doing all we can to conserve the resources of the country and win the war, we should not start out with this great wastefulness. [Applause.]

It is a fact that in the purchase of a liberty bond, where an individual gives Uncle Sam a dollar and gets a dollar back, to my mind, gentlemen, that is no particular mark of patriotism. It is but transferring and converting a citizen's dollar into good security, and the best in the world. Therefore, if the officials of this Government were as familiar as they might be with the resources of corporations and individuals, all subjects of taxation, I believe there should be some curtailment; that there really is not the necessity for running up and down and all over the country with special trains and exciting the people about the great necessity for this money when they have the means of taking it, since they know where it is, and thus save all this expense. In other words, if a corporation or an individual is known to have a certain amount of money—and the record is there under oath of every man's resources and every corporation's earnings—why not then let the Government through constituted authority say, "Mr. So-and-so, so many bonds are yours. Walk up to the counter and pay for them." In that way there would be saved this awful expenditure for costly lithographs and literature, as well as relieve the congestion of the mail service, which is so frightfully disorganized. And we regret to say that an impression is abroad that much of this literature seems to have been issued rather to boost Democratic aspirants and the Democratic Party than to accomplish anything practical toward "bringing Germany to terms and ending the war." I am in the printing business and have some comprehension of what all this must cost the Government, and I would like to see that expense account, which I am sure would appal the country. Extravagance and wastefulness of every description should be discouraged in every division of public service, and right here is a good place to begin. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. FESS and Mr. HULL of Tennessee rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to make this observation: Some time before 1912 the Government of Austria, taking advantage of an unsettled condition in the Balkans, extended her military authority over the two Provinces of Herzegovinia and Bosnia, which led to a very bitter feeling against the Austrian Government. Just four years ago to-day the heir of the throne of Austria was in the city of Sarrejevo, the capital of Bosnia, and by a half-witted citizen, who had been stirred by the injury to the people by Austria, the archduke was assassinated. That started this world on fire.

At that time Great Britain had an indebtedness of $3,500,000,000. To-day, according to Bonar Law in his last statement in Parliament, it is $37,000,000,000. The United States had an indebtedness of less than $1,000,000,000—to be accurate, $973,000,000. To-day we will have an indebtedness of between $17,000,000,000 and $18,000,000,000, if you omit our loans to the foreign countries. If these are included, it will reach $24,000,000,000. France had an indebtedness at the time of nearly $6,500,000,000. Her indebtedness now is approaching $30,000,000,000. Germany's situation is somewhat different, because she finances the war by enforced loans instead of taxation. No one can state accurately what her debt is at the present time; but in proportion it is not less than her great antagonists. The comparative debts, as estimated, are as follows:

Public debt of the principal belligerent countries.

Therefore, I have just made this observation on this anniversary day, that an incident in the capital of Bosnia four years ago to-day was seized upon as the occasion for the interruption, if not total disruption, of the entire world and is a comment upon the civilization of the world.

Of course, we are going to pass this $8,000,000,000 of a loan without opposition and in a very few minutes. While it is bewildering to those of us who see in figures, because the world is rapidly reaching the place where the interest on the debt totally consumes the income, yet we will not hesitate to do all that is necessary to win this war; hence the unanimous vote to-day.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12580) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The bill has passed unanimously.

On motion of Mr. HULL of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WINGO, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting two speeches, both on the subject of the war, that I made during my absence in Connecticut the last few days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 5712.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill

H. R. 5712. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my remarks and make a historical correction in reference to the James Buchanan monument discussion and debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to take up the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, the rule about printing to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, I entertain a high regard for the gentleman from Mississippi and have a high regard for anything he desires, but I am constrained to object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Georgia withhold his objection for a moment? I am asking the gentleman from Georgia if he will withhold his objection for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will give heed.

Mr. LARSEN. I think we should proceed with business.

Mr. HELM rose.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the most pressing thing for consideration is the consideration of these conference reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think we ought to have a quorum here. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 294 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

FOURTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT DECENNIAL CENSUSES.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withhold his motion for a moment, I would like to make a statement to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, we are within two days of the close of the fiscal year. It is perfectly impossible for the enrolling clerks to enroll all the bills that they are going to have to enroll if we postpone much longer the consideration of conference reports, and I trust my colleague, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], will not insist upon pressing his motion, and will give way in order that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] may present for the consideration of the House the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand they have been.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, in response to the statement of my colleague [Mr. SHERLEY], I wish to say that before I rose to address the House for the purpose of moving to go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the Census bill I did not believe it was interfering with any other arrangement. I have manifested too agreeable a disposition in this House with certain gentlemen who are disposed and who are attempting to postpone the passage of this bill until after the recess. There is a perfectly obvious and manifest intention on the part of certain gentlemen to delay the passage of this bill. I have stated before—and my conduct on the floor has demonstrated the fact—that I am reasonable, and I do not want to stand in opposition or obstruction to these appropriation bills. The bill of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has not been printed under the rule. My bill is a privileged bill. I was within my rights, and I did not consider that I was interfering with anyone else.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. HELM. On the contrary, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], out of a feeling of ill will and pique, made the point of no quorum for the purpose of obstructing business, and I am disposed to insist upon my position before the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. HELM. If the gentleman from Mississippi thinks it will not consume a very considerable time, and that I can have an opportunity this afternoon to proceed with this bill, I am perfectly willing to stand aside once more and let this bill be considered.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, in response to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], I will state that there are only three items of disagreement in the District of Columbia appropriation bill. One item is the half-and-half proposition. I am going to ask that the House insist on its disagreement to these three amendments, and if the House wants to take a vote on them I shall be very glad for the House to take the vote. I do not know just how long, nor could anyone tell what the debate will amount to. I hope it will not consume more than an hour at the outside.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman going to make a motion or ask anything?

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] has made his motion. I was going to ask unanimous consent that the House take up the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 11692), notwithstanding the fact that it had not been printed under the rule.

Mr. HELM. I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky withdraws his motion. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to take up the District of Columbia conference report, notwithstanding the rule about printing. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the House conferees.

[The conference report and statement of House conferees appear on pages 8424–8429 in to-day's House proceedings.]

Mr. SISSON. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOON). The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreements to amendments 1, 61, and 83. No. 1 is the half-and-half amendment. No. 63 is the Keller amendment——

Mr. GILLETT. I think they had better be taken up one by one and not joined together.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman want a separate vote on each one?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Then I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1, which is the half-and-half amendment.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment, and on that I should like to say just a word.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman desire any time?

Mr. GILLETT. Two minutes, perhaps.

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that without respect to the merits of the controversy, it seems to me we have reached a stage where the House had better recede. We are all expecting to adjourn now in a few days. We know that the Senate is just as obstinate in standing by the half-and-half proposition as the House is in repealing it, and when that is the fact the body which wishes to change existing law is the one which always, sooner or later, is obliged to recede.

Mr. NOLAN. In view of the situation that has developed in the Senate in reference to woman suffrage, and in reference to the amendment to the agricultural bill about intoxicating liquors, does the gentleman think we are likely to adjourn in a few days?

Mr. GILLETT. I do. I understand the suffrage question is practically out of the way.

Mr. MONDELL. In any event, this bill should be passed before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. GILLETT. Exactly. Whether we recess or not, it is extremely important that not only this but every other appropriation bill should be passed before next Monday.

Mr. RAKER. I see by the RECORD this morning that in the Senate yesterday Senator SMOOT, and I think other Senators, said there would be no agreement to adjourn or take a recess until the suffrage amendment was disposed of.

Mr. GILLETT. Statements of that kind are often made which do not materialize in events. I understand that four Senators who are in favor of suffrage have left the city and gone away already.

Mr. RAKER. What are you going to do? Are you going to let the oil-leasing bill and the water-power bill remain undisposed of?

Mr. GILLETT. I am not responsible for the program of legislation.

Mr. RAKER. I can not understand why this talk about recess or adjournment should always be presented when such vital legislation is before the country and the House.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think it is fair for the gentleman to interject that under the guise of a question. But, as I say, that is not pertinent to my argument. It is enough to state that it is important that these appropriation bills be got out of the way before next Monday. Now, one of the complaints that we on this side of the House have for years made of you gentlemen on that side, time and again, is that you are not efficient; that you do not pass appropriation bills in season.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman give me three minutes more?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Have we not voted on this proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We have not. A preferential motion was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts and is now before the House.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Did not the House vote on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the gentleman from Mississippi yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts to make his motion.

Mr. GILLETT. As you are aware, we on this side have often criticized you on that side for not being efficient and not passing appropriation bills before the end of the fiscal year. It is going to require great expedition to pass the pending appropriation bills before the end of this fiscal year. I hope it will be done. I am glad to assist in every way I can, and I think one of the important methods of expediting them would be for the House to recede now on this amendment. We will have to do it eventually; why not now?

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Do you still insist that we are inefficient on this side or do you intend to retract that statement?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not retract it, but I am not making any charges during this war period.

Mr. SISSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is that something which the House has three times determined to be wrong and which a special commission found to be wrong shall now be determined to be right for two reasons. One is that a recess may be expedited, and the other is that because the other body of Congress has always had its way heretofore in this matter of half and half, the gentleman makes the violent assumption that it will again have its way in this same matter. The first reason, as I am reminded, would require us to agree to a plan of large additional authority of expenditure unnecessarily in order that we may have what the gentleman calls a temporary recess. Another is the total abandonment of every reason that could be applied to a system of taxation. There is no man, and I say it frankly and without any prejudice, because my only interest in this matter is that I was a member of a special commission which gave attention to this matter for three months—I say frankly there never has been any man who gave investigation to the question of the taxation of the District of Columbia who must not be brought to the conclusion that the half-and-half plan is unnecessary; that it has outlived its usefulness; that it is a nullity, so to speak, and accomplishes nothing. It provides that no matter what the District of Columbia may be rightfully assessed for taxation the people in all of our districts must match dollar for dollar with the money raised in the District of Columbia. At one time it had a good purpose, but it has no such purpose now. They could not spend the money. The commissioners at the time of the hearings—Mr. Brownlow and Mr. Newman, now Maj. Newman—were emphatic in saying that the half-and-half plan should be abolished.

There is no contention on the part of anybody, except the so-called landlords' association in the District of Columbia, which is now seeking more than ever to fatten on the public interests, that it should be retained. There is absolutely nobody, no one who ever investigated the scientific application of taxation, no one who looked at it from a practical side, can find any reason for maintaining the half-and-half plan.

At present this is the situation: Something like $9,000,000 is raised by the District of Columbia by taxation, which is not high comparing it with other cities. Fourteen million dollars is all that is necessary to run the government in this District as it should be run. So, if the law is carried out, there is absolutely $5,000,000 of taxes raised here for which there is no use, and the thing which we face is this, and we might as well know it, that those who are interested here in the development of land and in the renting of houses at exorbitant charge want to get everything they can in the city of Washington without paying for it themselves. That we might as well understand if there be anybody in the House who does not already understand it. I say that the people of the United States understand it, because there is hardly a nook and corner in the whole United States of America which does not to-day recognize that a certain ring of people in Washington are using every device they can to furnish their own interests out of the Public Treasury. What they contemplate now—and I say it advisedly—is that in this system of bookkeeping they want the United States to be compelled on paper to match every dollar which the District of Columbia is raising, so that at the end of the fiscal year there will be five million unusued, unnecessary dollars, so that in the next year or two there will be eight or nine million unused, unnecessary dollars, and at that time the proposition will be made to use that money; that this same element will claim the United States has pledged itself by the old law to match dollar for dollar, and therefore we must use the unexpended balance for municipal purposes and make but a nominal levy. That is precisely the situation. I challenge anyone, no matter what opinion he may have, to refute it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I yield the gentleman four minutes more.

Mr. GARD. I speak of this in the sense that we all may have a thorough understanding. These which I have tried to give Members of the House are the facts, and I have tried to express them kindly, without prejudice or ill feeling.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman has referred to the fact that more money will be raised by taxation in the District on the half-and-half plan than can properly be expended. Has the gentleman investigated the crowded condition of the schools, the poor pay of the school-teachers, the many streets that need being remade?

Mr. GARD. I have taken all those things into consideration, and my information is that the condition of all municipal utilities here is good.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does not the gentleman know that these conditions exist, that appropriations are not made sufficient for schools, the appropriations are not large enough to properly pay the school-teachers who are employed here for the small sum of $500 a year?

Mr. GARD. I am happy to say that the schools in the city of Washington are comparable in efficiency and excellency to any school system in the United States.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are very much crowded.

Mr. GARD. They may be crowded, but there is every disposition on the part of every Congress to afford every facility to the people of the District of Columbia. In the matter of schools and school-teachers, there will be nothing absolutely in the mind of Congress to prevent this District having exactly all that it ought to have, and this applies to other public utilities. I repeat that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia do not ask for enough money to be carried by the interpretation of the half-and-half plan. And, as I am reminded by my colleague from Kentucky, under the amendment which we are now discussing everything that is necessary, if it be half-and-half, is to be paid out of the General Government. This is the amendment as it applies—first take the money raised by taxation upon real estate largely and such personal property as is taxed and use that for the payment of the expenses of the District of Columbia. That is the whole thing. Is that wrong?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is speaking of the plan to take the place of the half-and-half plan?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is all ready to go into execution?

Mr. GARD. Oh, yes; it is all ready to go into execution. There has been some criticism about this amendment as being "a rider."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. If I have the time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That amendment in operation would mean just this: If the Committee on Appropriations thought that the amount raised by taxation in the district was sufficient that would be the end of the matter, and nothing would be required by the Federal Government, 25 or 50 per cent or any other per cent.

Mr. GARD. This is Federal territory and it is necessarily under the control of Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. True, but if the Committee on Appropriations should think that the amount raised by taxation in the District was sufficient for the District needs, nothing would be asked or called for from the Federal Government.

Mr. GARD. There is no question of that kind arising at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the amendment offered would work out in that way, if the Committee on Appropriations thought that the $9,000,000 raised by District taxation was sufficient.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the Committee on Appropriations should take that attitude, what differences would there be? The money would be in the Treasury unappropriated and could not be expended.

Mr. GARD. I merely desire to call attention to one other matter. There has been some criticism which has called this a rider. It is not a rider. It is just a necessary legislative authority on an appropriation bill of the money necessary to carry on this District government, and it means that the money which the people pay in taxation is to be applied, and everything necessary for everything which the gentleman from Kansas says ought to be had will be had and added by the General Government. It is an impossible proposition in taxation and in economics, and in reason and in justice, I submit, to permit a paper account to be built up here which in three years——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARD. May I have a minute more?

Mr. SISSON. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. You will see a paper obligation, which will be claimed by an element here which desires to profit selfishly from the Public Treasury, where they will say that the Congress stood by the half and half, that the Congress was pledged to match dollar for dollar, that the Congress said this money was unnecessary and did not spend it, and it was piled up in the Treasury, and they will claim that it is money set aside locally, and that it belongs to the District of Columbia, and that it should be applied to the payment of taxes, and the ordinary tax levy reduced. If this be generally known, and it should be generally known throughout the United States, I submit there would not be an intelligent electorate in any congressional district who would ask its representative to abide by such an erroneous and unnecessary system, and I submit in all frankness, in all fairness, as a matter of justice, that this and now is the time when the principle of the half and half should understandingly be tested out. The House has three times determined it, a special commission once determined it, and nobody who has ever examined it has found that this principle should be maintained. I am sure that with our efficient conferees taking the message of the House which it will give to the conferees of the Senate, this is the time to put away forever the absurdity of the half-and-half plan. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield first three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would not take the time of the House at all if it were not to take exception to part of the statement of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. I thoroughly disapprove of the half-and-half principle. It has no reason for existence, if it ever had any; but I also differ with the gentleman that there is any such actual status whereby there can be any real claim made by the District of Columbia to any surplus moneys that may be turned into the Treasury. This is the situation: The District of Columbia yields a certain amount of taxes that go into the Treasury of the United States. The District commissioners submit estimates of what they consider necessary to run the government of the District of Columbia and we appropriate the amount of money that we think necessary. It so happens at this time that the amount of money that is raised by District taxes is more than one-half of the amount of money that we annually appropriate. I am not willing for one moment to concede that because of that fact there is any right given to the District of Columbia to one dollar that goes into the Treasury of the United States as a result of District taxation, and I think it is important that that should be emphasized. I should be very glad to see this old provision here done away with. It has no reason for existence; but I do not want it to be said that if it is not done away with that thereby Congress has recognized the right of the District of Columbia to the funds over and beyond what are annually appropriated that are raised by the District taxation, and that might be thought a necessary result of the statement of the gentleman from Ohio in the event that the House did not have its way in this controversy now with the Senate.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I am glad the gentleman takes the position that he does, for I would not wish anyone high in authority, in connection with financial matters, to even assume such a right to exist; but is not this true, that under the principle of the half-and-half plan, the matching of dollar for dollar, the unexpended balance, if carried out—it is not carried out—would be applied to a fund controlled by the District of Columbia?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, "if"! But whenever that question comes up I have no doubt that the Congress of the United States will have sense enough and patriotism enough to prevent such an unjustifiable thing being done.

While I am on my feet I want to say just these words as to my conception of what should be the relationship of the Congress toward the District of Columbia. We ought to levy in the District of Columbia a fair tax, what represents a fair burden upon the people, let it produce what income it may. We ought then to appropriate for the District of Columbia what is necessary to properly maintain the District as the National Capital of the country, whether it be one-half, one-third, or two-thirds, as the case may be. It is not going to be necessary, in my judgment, at any period of time, for the Government to actually expend as much money out of funds raised from other sources of taxation as it will from the District, because the old condition when the District was unable to furnish the moneys that were necessary, or half of them, to run the government of the District of Columbia has passed away.

Washington has become a very great city, with great wealth here. The only right that any resident of the District of Columbia has is to ask that the tax that the Federal Government levies shall be a fair tax. That is all that any citizen has a right anywhere in this country over, and if flowing from that comes enough money to run the District of Columbia, well and good. If it does not, then we ought to supplement it with whatever is necessary, having in mind this is the Nation's Capital, and that we ought to maintain here not only a good government but an ideal government. I differ entirely with the statement of the gentleman from Kansas that the government of the District of Columbia is not creditable to the country. I think it is. I think that here is expended more money——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope the gentleman will yield; I did not say it is not creditable.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman implied that when he called attention to what he thought was a bad condition in the public schools and otherwise. I think that the District of Columbia has the best government of any city in America, and I think that the taxes that are levied here will compare in lightness favorably with any city in America; but there is more nonsense to the square inch printed here in the District of Columbia about this matter than on any subject on earth. It is not a matter of any great intricacy; what we want to do is to levy a fair tax, as we do, and then appropriate whatever money is necessary properly to run the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman know that exactly that proposition is contained in this amendment?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I wrote myself in my own hand practically that amendment the first time it ever saw legislative form. I am in sympathy with it, but the whole matter is now a bookkeeping quarrel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio who just spoke worked himself into a perfect nightmare of frightful anticipation as he conjured up a purely fanciful alleged devilish purpose on the part of the people of the District of Columbia touching the sums raised by taxation in the District which flow into the Treasury in the District. If the gentleman had stopped to think about that dream of his, he would have realized that its consummation depended entirely upon foolish action by the Congress of the United States, and I for one am not prepared to admit Congress is in any danger of doing the perfectly foolish and ridiculous thing that he assumes to fear. This is not the time to discuss the question of the half-and-half plan. It may be that there are other and better or more equitable plans, but if so it is at least extremely doubtful if the plan proposed in the House amendment is such an equitable or proper plan. The legislative situation is this: The House proposes on an appropriation bill to change the law. The Senate opposes that change of law, and the rule, as it is generally observed here, is that the House proposing legislation on an appropriation bill must eventually, if the other House insists, recede. We are within two days of the end of the fiscal year. The District of Columbia needs the funds with which to pay its people and conduct its government. The question is, Shall we contest over this question of legislation that ought to be settled in a separate bill? Shall we hold up the necessary appropriations or recede from our demand that there shall be legislation on an appropriation bill, contrary to the usual rule and procedure? Eventually, in my opinion, the House will have to recede. We should recede at this time and allow the District bill to become a law before the beginning of the fiscal year.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, a member of the committee.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this is the same matter that was discussed at the time this appropriation bill was up for original consideration. I urged at that time, and nothing has occurred since to change my mind, that this is not the time to change the system of taxation in the District of Columbia. The objection complained of by the gentleman from Ohio that there is a large surplus now on hand that is constantly increasing that should be expended for governmental purposes for the District I think is not well taken, for the reason that that sum of money is not at the command, and never will be, of the District Commissioners.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman just permit me to say I made no such contention?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is the impression I had and the impression that I think everyone had here, that at some future time, and in the very near future, that those who are in control of the immediate affairs of the District of Columbia will be claiming this money as theirs and that because it is theirs the District should go for a year or two years until this money is expended without any taxation whatever. That is a physical and legislative impossibility. They could not do that without the sanction of the Congress. All this money is paid into the Treasury of the United States and can not be gotten out of there except by affirmative legislation from this Congress, so that there is no danger from that source. There will be great need for the expenditure of more money than is now being expended to defray the current expenses of the District of Columbia after the war is over and after we settle down again to normal things and normal times. That there is need of school buildings in this city was demonstrated in the hearings before this committee. Hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars are needed for school buildings, but because of the fact that material could not be had, because of the fact that the cost of building has gone so high, it was dispensed with for the time being and temporary collapsible houses were substituted therefor.

That is but one item of the great necessity that will befall when these normal times come. The streets of this city are in worse condition than ever before and will remain so until after the war is over. And the Appropriations Committee, exercising good judgment, I believe, has restricted the construction of new streets in the city and are endeavoring only to keep up the old streets by necessary repairs.

Mr. RAKER. How is it, and how can the gentleman make the statement, that the streets shall be in the condition that they are in now? They are almost deplorable.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I admit they are almost deplorable, but if you will ask the gentlemen who have to do the supplying of street material you will find out. If you would make a demand to-day for 10 barrels of oil or a carload of oil, you could not get a drop of it, for the reason that the Government of the United States has commandeered it all, and it can not be gotten in any other city for street construction and can not be gotten here.

Mr. RAKER. Are these crossing of the street car lines to remain as they are now, getting almost impassable every day?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will answer that by saying that in the testimony before the committee it was demonstrated that the commissioners were doing their utmost to keep up these repairs, and that it was almost impossible to get the material and the help to even keep them in as good condition as they are. These are some of the reasons why this change in the taxing system of the District of Columbia should not be had now.

I have nothing in common with the people of the city of Washington except that in common to us all. I do not like many of their tactics; I do not like their profiteering; but I do not subscribe to the theory that all the Government property in the District of Columbia should be classed as Government property is classed and treated in the other cities throughout this country. True, the Government buildings of the city of Chicago, New York, and other large cities are not taxed, but they are mere incidents wherever they may be found. This is the District of Columbia, operated and controlled entirely by the Congress of the United States. It belongs to the whole people of the United States. It is theirs and not the property, or the exclusive property, of the people of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. A very large per cent, I do not know exactly what it is, of the material wealth of this District of Columbia belongs to the Government. It is the seat of the Government's activities, and they were never greater than they are at this minute. It would not be fair to have the people of the District of Columbia made to pay all the expenses of making these repairs, keeping up these streets and these parks, and in keeping this city as beautiful as we would have it kept by reason of its being the Capital of our Nation. But I do think there ought to be at some time in the near future, when we do get back to normal times again, when there should be a reclassification and a reformation of this taxing system, when the Government of the United States should pay in proportion as it owns property in the District of Columbia, and when the people of the District of Columbia should pay in proportion as they own property within this District of Columbia; or perhaps the system suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] would be just, that there should be a reasonable tax imposed upon the inhabitants of the District of Columbia to defray the necessary expense of government of the city and the keeping up of its improvements and the making of its repairs and additions, and whatever there is lacking by way of this tax should be appropriated out of the General Treasury of the United States. But this is not the time to do that, for the reasons I have stated, and no change should be made in the taxing scheme for the District until after the war is over, and then should be made as an independent proposition and not as a rider to an appropriation bill.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a minute.

I think the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is the true statement of facts about this entire matter. First, no man will state honestly that the people of the District of Columbia should not pay a reasonable tax, a tax just about like that which other people throughout the country pay on a reasonable assessment of their property. When that is done and the money paid into the Treasury, the Federal Government would then appropriate what it thought was necessary to pay the expenses of the Government maintained as Congress felt it ought to be maintained as the site of the National Capital. Now, that is exactly what the Gard amendment does. It does not do anything but that. Now, when we go to make up this bill every member of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the District of Columbia has found that the District Commissioners, whether they need the improvement or not, will endeavor to absorb twice as much as they raise by taxation in the District of Columbia. They came within a few dollars of doing that in this bill. What is the result? The burden is placed upon the subcommittee to go carefully through each item, in order to determine whether or not it is a just and a proper expenditure.

Now, in making up this bill we gave the District Commissioners every dollar they asked for for streets. In reference to the schools, we are willing to give them perhaps not every dollar they asked for but every dollar that is needed. But they themselves, after they made the estimates, admitted that if we were to give the money for the school buildings they could not get the material and labor with which to build them, and it would not relieve the crowded conditions of those schools of the city where they were much needed. So as a specific to remedy that we granted the people the temporary buildings which everyone of the board of education and the commissioners asked for, to take care of the crowded condition, and that condition will be taken care of as soon as the schools are open in the fall.

Mr. FOCHT. According to the statement which is made, I assume it would all come finally to a matter of assessed valuation of the property of the city of Washington?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. And who will do that assessing?

Mr. SISSON. The assessment of the property would be made by the assessor of the District of Columbia, as it is now.

Mr. FOCHT. Now, what is to prevent the Government from being flimflammed on that proposition?

Mr. SISSON. That may be true. If it does, it is the Government's own fault. Every man that I know that has ever investigated this half-and-half proposition, unless he is a Member of another body—and they seem never to have investigated it—has never found a single plank for it to stand on.

At a time when the District of Columbia was hopelessly in debt and in a bankrupt condition, with about 80,000 population, with $40,000,000 of indebtedness, and with the bonds of the District in such estimation that they could not be sold, the Federal Government took over the District of Columbia, and, in order that the bonds might not go below par, the Federal Government voluntarily assumed to pay half of those bonds, and, in order that the District of Columbia might, with its small population, be able to maintain the then wide and almost unoccupied streets in many sections of the city, the Federal Government agreed to pay half the expenses of the District of Columbia. The Government took over that responsibility, and on taking it over the people of the District gave up the right of suffrage.

That has been the condition until the city has grown to be a city of about 400,000 people. There will be about $5,000,000 left in the Treasury from this and the preceding year after we shall have appropriated every dollar that the District of Columbia needs during the current fiscal year.

Now, gentlemen, the commission that was appointed from this House and the Senate was composed of men not one of whom had voted to abolish, as I recall, the half-and-half proposition; and yet after holding hearings for a month in the District of Columbia, taking two large volumes of testimony, they made a unanimous report in favor of discontinuing the half-and-half principle. We did not pay any attention to the half-and-half principle in making up the bill. We are compelled to pay out of the Treasury of the United States one-half as many dollars as we appropriate, notwithstanding the fact that there may be $5,000,000 on the books to the credit of the District of Columbia. That money being there to the credit of the District of Columbia at a time when the Treasury is bleeding at every pore, and when the people of the United States need every dollar that they can get, if there ever was a time in the history of the Nation when we would be warranted in saying that the Federal Government would pay only that amount over and above what other cities pay because of the presence of the Federal Government in the District of Columbia now is the time; and the only fair way to determine that is to put a reasonable assessment upon the property and tax that property at a reasonable rate, put those taxes in the Treasury, and then let the Federal Government appropriate all it wants to appropriate to run this District government.

No man living can controvert the fairness of that proposition. That is the position your House conferees have taken on every occasion when this matter has been submitted to the House of Representatives on a roll call, when the House has voted more than 2 to 1 to abolish the half-and-half principle and adopt a sensible and fair plan. On every occasion when we have made an effort to abolish the half-and-half principle the Senate have waited from week to week, until just before the adjournment of Congress an appeal is made to us that unless we continue the half-and-half principle there was going to be no bill and no money to run the District.

Now, gentlemen of the House, I do not think that is a fair thing to do. As I have looked up the record, the other body has never discussed the subject, except on one occasion, and on the one occasion when it discussed it—and then only for a few minutes—there were thirty-odd Senators who voted to abolish the half-and-half principle, and that is the only vote that body has taken after a discussion. Then they became uneasy about it, and it was at that time that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] made the motion to refer the whole matter to a commission, when we had declined to recede by a vote of 2 to 1; it was then, I say, that the gentleman from Alabama made his motion to have the whole thing referred to a joint commission. That joint commission was appointed and made a unanimous report, and at the time that report was made, I will say frankly to my friend here [Mr. GARD], Mr. Page, of North Carolina, and I felt that that simply meant to shelve the thing. But the commission did make a report, although its members had voted always to retain the half-and-half principle. After it had investigated the subject, the commission made a unanimous report, signed by three Senators and three Members of the House, to the effect that there was no reason for the further continuance of the half-and-half principle.

Feeling that way about it, your conferees were unwilling to recede in this matter, except at the hands of the House by a vote; and I say to the House now personally that I feel it is the duty of the House at this time to insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment and let the Members of the Senate discuss this matter among themselves and see if they can assign a single reason why the half-and-half principle should be retained. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment No. 1 and concur therein.

Mr. SISSON. On that I move the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe the vote now follows on my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment.

Mr. SISSON. My understanding is that the voting down of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is tantamount to disagreeing to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I understand that the Speaker has decided that the rejection of a motion to recede and concur is tantamount to a motion to adhere.

Mr. SISSON. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 61. That is known as the famous Keller amendment. That is the amendment that the Senate has been putting on ever since I have been a member of the District subcommittee. I do not know how long ago it began, but I will state to the committee that the House has never agreed to that. Mr. Page, of North Carolina, and I went out and looked at the property, and under the decision of the court——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What is that about?

Mr. SISSON. Well, it is in reference to the condemnation for street purposes of a portion of Mr. Keller's property out here in the northwest. If this amendment is agreed to, there are a thousand cases waiting that will overwhelm us to turn down the decisions of the courts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 61, page 24, lines 8 to 13, inclusive, as follows: "Damages and payment for ground on account of condemnation proceedings: To pay Thomas W. and Alice N Keller for ground taken and damages on account of condemnation proceedings in square No. 2838, in the city of Washington, $3,820."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I also move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to amendment numbered 83.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, lines 19 and 20, strike out the following: "$76,730, to be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia," and insert in lieu thereof "$70,030."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment just read.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the Senate did not ask for a conference. If so, I move that the House ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I would be glad to, but I am through with this matter now.

The SPEAKER announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SISSON, Mr. MCANDREWS, and Mr. DAVIS.

FOURTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT DECENNIAL CENSUSES.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 11984, providing for the Fourteenth and subsequent censuses.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 49, noes 31.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the Fourteenth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, to agriculture, to manufactures, to forestry and forest products, and to mines and quarries. The schedules relating to population shall include for each inhabitant the name, place of abode, relationship to head of family, color, sex, age, conjugal condition, place of birth, place of birth of parents, nationality or mother tongue of all persons born in foreign countries, nationality or mother tongue of parents of foreign birth, number of years in the United States, citizenship, occupation, whether or not employer or employee, whether or not engaged in agriculture, school attendance, literacy, and tenure of home, and the name and address of each blind or deaf and dumb person.

The schedules relating to agriculture shall include name, color, sex, and country of birth of occupant of each farm, tenure, acreage of farm, acreage of woodland, value of farm and improvements, and the encumbrance thereon, value of farm implements, number of live stock on farms, ranges, and elsewhere, and the acreage of crops and the quantities of crops and other farm products for the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration. Inquiries shall be made as to the quantity of land reclaimed by irrigation and drainage and the crops produced; also as to the location and character of irrigation and drainage enterprises, and the capital invested in such enterprises.

The schedules of inquiries relating to manufactures and to mines and quarries shall include the name and location of each establishment; character of organization, whether individual, corporate, or other form; character of business or kind of goods manufactured; amount of capital actually invested; number of proprietors, firm members, copartners and officers, and the amount of their salaries; number of employees and the amount of their wages; quantity and cost of materials used in manufactures; principal miscellaneous expenses; quantity and value of products; time in operation during the year; character and quantity of power used; and character and number of machines employed.

The census of manufactures and of mines and quarries shall relate to the year ending December 31, next preceding the enumeration of population, and shall be confined to manufacturing establishments and mines and quarries which were in active operation during all or a portion of that year. The census of manufactures shall furthermore be confined to manufacturing establishments conducted under what is known as the factory system, exclusive of the so-called neighborhood, household, and hand industries.

Whenever he shall deem it expedient, the Director of the Census may charge the collection of these statistics upon special agents or upon detailed employees, to be employed without respect to locality.

The form and subdivision of inquiries necessary to obtain the information under the foregoing topics shall be determined by the Director of the Census.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask for some information. What is the meaning of the statement in this section that—

The census of manufactures shall furthermore be confined to manufacturing establishments conducted under what is known as the factory system, exclusive of the so-called neighborhood, household, and hand industries.

What is the distinction there? What is included?

Mr. HELM. You see the ladies sitting together knitting socks.

Mr. WALSH. That is neighborhood manufacture?

Mr. HELM. As distinguished from a business plant run for profit.

Mr. WALSH. What is meant by hand industries?

Mr. HELM. Hand industries, I suppose, would include the preservation or canning of fruit or vegetables.

Mr. WALSH. Without machinery?

Mr. HELM. Without machinery.

Mr. WALSH. And basket making and things of that sort?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Then I suppose the factory system would include all buildings devoted to the manufacture of articles by machinery, or partially by machinery and partially by hand?

Mr. HELM. I think so.

Mr. WALSH. As long as they are going to take a census of manufactures, I wondered why we should not know how much is being manufactured by these other methods. They have got to visit these households and neighborhoods. When they are taking a census of the population, why can they not at the same time get statistics with relation to these other smaller industries? If we are going to make a census of manufactures, why not make it as complete as possible?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I represent an agricultural district. I have in mind in my own country a woman who weaves carpets. She lives on a farm and she weaves carpets for her neighbors and for some town people. I also recall a blind man who makes brooms. While he is a manufacturer, the industry is not such as comes under the general term of manufacturers. The law has never covered that class of industries, and they have never been included in any census that has been taken.

Mr. WALSH. But while the total would be of slight significance possibly in a county or district, it must be of quite considerable proportions in the whole country. If this were taken in each county, it would furnish information of considerable value, inasmuch as we are to have a census of manufactures.

Mr. PADGETT. Are not the agents who take the census of population limited to population and are there not different agents who take the census of manufactures?

Mr. HELM. The census of manufactures is taken by what are termed "special" agents, not by the enumerators of the population or those who take the agricultural census. The special agents who take the census of manufactures are specially qualified to go to the steel plants, for instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more, because I want to ask a question about another paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Special agents visit the manufacturers, and I believe there are between 1,200 and 1,500 special agents appointed by the bureau for the purpose of taking the census of manufactures. So the enumerator of the agricultural census and of the population does not take the census of the manufactures.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. It seems to me that there is a further distinction there than that made by the gentlemen. In some countries, and I understand notably so in Japan, a great deal of the manufactures are produced in households distinguished from central factories. One man perhaps will have a contract for the production of a quantity of a certain article, and he farms out that contract to many households in a certain community. Then he collects them and sends them into commerce. Whereas in this country chiefly the plan is of a central factory, where workers gather in one place and produce the article. If there are any places where the neighborhood plan prevails we might very well have the statistics.

Mr. HELM. What we have in the way of neighborhood manufactures in this country is the canning of vegetables and preserves or articles for home use, which are generally made by the families for home consumption. They do not enter into the volume of commercial trade.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman may not be familiar with that system of manufacture, but it has prevailed to a great extent in Switzerland in connection with the making of watches and clocks.

Mr. HELM. I am more familiar with conditions in the United States, and unless some one can cite a case where business is done on any considerable scale in that way I do not think it would be wise to provide for it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Would the neighborhood and household industry include the so-called sweatshop in certain localities where parties are assembled in poorly ventilated small rooms for the purpose of making waists, clothing, working upon other products, making artificial flowers, and brushes and things of that kind?

Mr. HELM. If that is taken, it would be taken by special agents who would do the work.

Mr. WALSH. And they could make inquiry about that notwithstanding this provision.

Mr. HELM. Well, if the gentleman gets the line of distinction between the manufactures and what he referred to in the beginning of his talk—home manufactures such as I tried to illustrate as distinguished from manufactures of articles that go into commercial channels. All manufactures that go into commercial channels are taken by a special agent and not by the enumerator.

Mr. WALSH. There are lots of products manufactured in households in neighborhoods that go into commerce. People make jellies, canned preserves, and fruit.

Mr. HELM. In negligible quantities for home consumption.

Mr. WALSH. Negligible as confined to a single district, but my point is that throughout the whole country it would amount to a great deal. It seems to me that the bureau should require information upon those matters. Now, one further question I want to ask before my time expires. The bill provides:

Whenever he shall deem it expedient, the Director of the Census may charge the collection of these statistics upon special agents or upon detailed employees, to be employed without respect to locality.

Does that mean that he may impose the duty of collecting these statistics upon agents?

Mr. HELM. The director is given leeway to exercise his discretion between matters that ought to be listed and matters of such a negligible nature that they ought not to be.

Mr. WALSH. Does that mean that he may impose the duty of collecting the statistics upon special agents, or does it mean that he may charge the collection of statistics upon special agents? What does the word "charge" mean?

Mr. HELM. It is used in the sense of delegate or assign.

Mr. WALSH. It means that he can appoint special agents rather than these——

Mr. HELM. Assign a special agent to look into the question where, for instance, a man is running a dairy or something of that kind, or if a farmer has a herd of cows and is manufacturing considerable butter, or putting out a considerable quantity of milk. Instead of assigning it to the enumerator, he would send a special agent to do this class of work.

Mr. WALSH. It means that he could appoint them without respect to the locality and that they would be in addition to those provided in the bill?

Mr. HELM. No; he would utilize the force he had.

Mr. WALSH. Does this bill provide for special agents?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. And the number is specified?

Mr. HELM. I would not answer that at present, but it is my opinion that it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the Director of the Census shall, at least six months prior to the date fixed for commencing the enumeration at the Fourteenth and each succeeding decennial census, designate the number, whether one or more, of supervisors of census for each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, and shall define the districts within which they are to act; except that the Director of the Census, in his discretion, need not designate supervisors for Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, but in lieu thereof may employ special agents as hereinafter provided. The supervisors shall be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census: Provided, That the whole number of supervisors shall not exceed 400: Provided further, That so far as practicable and desirable the boundaries of the supervisors' districts shall conform to the boundaries of the congressional districts: And provided further, That if in any supervisor's district the supervisor has not been appointed and qualified 90 days preceding the date fixed for the commencement of the enumeration, or if any vacancy shall occur thereafter, either through death, removal, or resignation of a supervisor, or from any other cause, the Director of the Census may appoint a temporary supervisor or detail an employee of the Census Office to act as supervisor for that district.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 11, after the second "the," strike out the words "Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census" and insert the following: "President, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate," so that the same shall read: "The supervisors shall be appointed by the President, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate."

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, section 9 of the bill under consideration provides that the great army of supervisors and enumerators for the census of 1920 shall be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce upon recommendation of the Director of the Census. My amendment strikes out that provision and leaves the appointment of supervisors and the enumerators under the existing law, so that the coming census shall be taken the same as the last, where the supervisors and enumerators were appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate.

It is well at this time to pause and review the progress of the present bill. It has been forced to its present position by a party vote and the strength of the majority party. It took a party vote to force its consideration in this House a year in advance of the time when it could possibly be of any use. It took a party vote to defeat my amendment to restrict the census in war time to population only. It took a party vote to raise and increase the salaries and expenses of a great army of enumerators, supervisors, and officials in the Census Bureau; and now it will certainly take the full party vote of the majority to change the existing law and remove from the President and the Senate the right to approve these 400 supervisors and this vast army of enumerators and make them the mere political hirelings of two politicians in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes; for a question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. All of the minority members of the Committee on the Census, the Republican members of the committee, are not in agreement with the gentleman on those questions, for they voted with the majority.

Mr. HERSEY. The record shows all this.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The record shows that all of the minority members of the committee are with the majority members of the Committee on the Census, except the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Missouri is mistaken in what he states.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In what respect?

Mr. GILLETT. In stating that all of the Republicans on the committee favor this proposition.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not talking about this proposition.

Mr. HERSEY. He is talking about the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] is here, and he can challenge the statement if it is not correct. I say that we were all in accord in reporting out this bill in its present form, except the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. That is true; we all voted to report it out in the present form except the gentleman from Maine. However, we did not agree to everything in the bill, and this is one of the provisions to which I would take exception, personally.

Mr. HERSEY. Up to the present moment the majority party has secured no particular political advantage by the adoption of the first eight sections of this bill. They have, it is true, provided for the taking of a useless and expensive census of "everything in sight," but on the other hand if this census is taken by supervisors and enumerators, appointed and approved as they were 10 years ago by the President and the Senate, we will still have an honest but worthless census without any political advantage, graft, or spoils.

Unless the majority can defeat my amendment, and thereby take away these appointments from the President and the approval of the same from the Senate and hand them all over to two Democratic politicians as political patronage, then the great object and purpose of this bill will have been defeated.

Let us face the issue squarely. No one need be deceived. It is utterly useless and senseless to argue that the officeholders of any political party, be they Republicans or Democrats, will fail to take advantage of all their opportunities to retain their place and power in the Government. When you consider the present bill in the light of surrounding circumstances you will be surprised at the opportunity therein provided to give the Democratic Party perpetuity in this Nation in 1920. Let me call your attention to a few startling facts:

At Nineteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue in this city stands that magnificent structure of 11 stories, the beautiful Commerce Building, occupied by the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of the Census. The Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, and the Director of the Census, Mr. Rogers, have under them 15,000 employees and agents. They are a power in the administration and naturally take a lively interest in devising ways and means whereby they may retain their great offices with their large salaries and emoluments after the presidential election of 1920. This bill was prepared in their offices, and while we all recognize this bill as a political subterfuge under the guise of a census and a war measure we must all admire the political genius of these two party workers that devised and conceived such a bill.

By this bill the appointment and approval of the supervisors and enumerators are all taken away from the President and the Senate, not because they do not trust the President and suspect the Senate but they place the President in a position whereby he can avoid responsibility without criticism. We all know that if the President makes the appointments he must send the names to the Senate for approval and the people of the Nation will know in every congressional district, in every city and town, the names of the persons who have been nominated as supervisors and enumerators, and if they do not approve these men they will at once call upon their Senators to reject them.

Under this bill these appointments can be made secretly in the Department of Commerce by these two politicians and the people may never know who are to be the enumerators and supervisors until these men silently enter their homes, shops, factories, and mines, and not until called upon will they ever present the credentials of the Department of Commerce.

The President will not interfere with this political scheme by the exercise of his veto. He can not do so and retain the dignity of his office. By the passage of this bill we say to the President that we do not trust him to appoint these men, and he, of course, will not force his services upon the Congress after we have said that his services are no longer required. The Executive may write to us his usual letter of approval of this bill as a war measure but the responsibility of this legislation can never be laid to the door of the President, but those who vote for its passage, as it is now written, will have an opportunity to explain to the people they represent why they permitted all the safeguards of the past to be removed from this legislation and consented to this infamous system of political spoils.

When the Director of the Census, Mr. Rogers, was before our committee, he was asked about his relations with the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, in the matter of the census. He said:

> He (Mr. Redfield) is heartily in accord with me and has backed me up in all my efforts for cooperation and effective hard work. He commends me when I am right and advises me when I am not right, and our relations are most cordial.

What a delightful pair of astute politicians! Damon and Pythias! Rogers and Redfield! How pleasantly and effectively they work together for the interest of their political party!

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Not now. There has been a great deal of dust thrown into the eyes of the Members in this House in the discussion of this bill by gentlemen who have claimed that these supervisors and enumerators will commence their work January 1, 1920, and close their duties in about three months thereafter, and will, therefore, have no opportunity to do political work in the campaign of 1920. It is true that the enumerators will take a census of the population, and that they can easily complete that work in about three months, but under this bill their work will not end there. There will be a complete census of agriculture, manufactures, mines and mining, forestry and forest products, to continue over the whole of the year 1920. I beg to call your attention to the provisions of section 18 of the bill, where it is provided that special agents may be appointed by the Director of the Census to carry out the provisions of this act, and that such special agents shall perform such duties in connection with the enforcement of this act as may be required of them by the director; that there is no limit to the number of special agents that may be thus employed at $6 per day, with $4 for subsistence and the necessary traveling expenses.

This great army of supervisors and enumerators that have been welded into a great political organization by the skillful hands of these two politicians can be continued through the whole year of 1920 and longer if necessary by appointing them special agents to take the balance of the census. It is an attempt to inaugurate and organize the most tremendous political organization ever known in the history of the country.

Hitherto political contests have been made in the open. Each Congressman must make a return of his campaign expenses, make public the names of his agents, how much money he has spent and for what purpose. He can have no agent except one who is known to the people. The political fights of the past have been made in the press and in the public forum, but this bill changes all this, and in the presidential campaign of 1920 there is to go out into the Nation a silent army of unknown political workers. They will not appear in public, in the press, or on the platform, but they will creep into the homes of the people, out into the harvest fields, into the shops of the Nation, into the factories of the people, into the labor organizations, into the mills and camps of the lumbermen, and down into the mines of the Nation, and if any question is raised they will turn back the lapel of their coat and show the badge of the Department of Commerce.

Let it be known now that any Republican who votes to retain this provision of the bill will find that he has encompassed his own defeat, not alone by the rebuke of his people and of his party, but he will find in the presidential election of 1920, when he is again a candidate for office, that he must fight this silent, secret Democratic organization that whispers prejudice and falsehood into the ears of the people under the guise of Government workers—falsehood and prejudice that he can not answer. He will be stabbed in the back by political assassins, and then perhaps for the first time it will occur to him that he was deceived by the President's statements that "politics has been adjourned in Congress." [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I discover that the liver of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] is still out of order. I am sure it will be interesting for the Secretary of Commerce to learn that he is a politician. If he is a politician, I must say that that trait in his make-up has not been abnormally developed. The Chief of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, Gen. Uhler, and the Commissioner of Navigation, Mr. Chamberlain, are both Republicans. They might have been easily removed at the beginning of the Wilson administration if the Secretary of Commerce had been a partisan Democrat.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know Mr. Chamberlain's politics, but if I recollect right he was appointed by Mr. Cleveland.

Mr. ALEXANDER. He was. He was a Cleveland Democrat; but he has been affiliating with the Republican Party ever since the election of President McKinley.

Mr. GILLETT. I did not know it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I may say that I have been thrown into personal contact with these two gentlemen for years past as the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. When this administration came into power these estimable gentlemen were continued in the service, and with my approval. There has been no partisanship in that department so far as I am able to discover. I want to answer the criticism of the gentleman that if this provision is left in the bill two politicians will manipulate this great census for political purposes. I say that not a scintilla of evidence has been submitted to justify that statement and there is not anything in the history of that department under this administration upon which to justify any such statement.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; not at this time; I wish to complete my statement. The committee appointed by the director to consider amendments in the existing law with a view to taking it and to meet a possible administrative difficulty in the Fourteenth decennial census, composed of Mr. W. L. Austin, Mr. W. C. Hunt, Mr. Joseph A. Hill, Mr. C. S. Sloane, Mr. T. J. Fitzgerald, Mr. W. M. Steuart, Mr. E. F. Hartley, and Mr. Le Verne Beales, secretary, went over the existing census law and recommended certain changes which they regarded as necessary in the way of amendment in the present act. Here is what they say, and their suggestions appealed to the Committee on the Census and were regarded as meritorious. As I stated to the gentleman from Massachusetts the other day, I do not care a fig how these men are appointed if this difficulty can be obviated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not at present. On page 21 appears their report. I quote from it:

This is the committee speaking:

The section as amended provides that "the supervisors shall be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census." This change has been introduced mainly for the reason that the Senate in all probability will not be in session at the time when the appointment of supervisors must be made. The next census, if the law is amended in accordance with the recommendations of this committee, will be taken in January, 1920. The present Congress will expire March 4, 1919, and the next Congress will normally not meet until December of that year. But the supervisors should be selected and commissioned between July 1, the date on which the bureau is organized on the decennial census basis, and October 1, or 90 days before the date of the census.

It is simply to meet that administrative difficulty that the change in the manner of the appointment of the supervisors was made. The committee accepted the change as recommended by that committee. As I say, personally I do not care whether they are appointed by the Secretary of Commerce or by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order. To-morrow is apt to be a very long and strenuous day, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. ASWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman to withhold that for a little while and let us do a little work on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan makes a point of order that there is no quorum present and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Thirty-seven Members are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11984, and finding itself without a quorum under the rule he had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 266 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he presented herewith the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to occupy the time of the committee only for a moment to call the attention of the committee to the importance of the business principle involved in this appointment of the supervisors by the Director of the Census and the Secretary of Commerce. I take it, every gentleman on this floor is concerned in having this census work made a success, and if the Director of the Census is to have any authority over the supervisors he certainly should have a good deal to say in their appointment. It is well known by all those who have had any connection with this work that in the past supervisors have frequently and deliberately ignored the Director of the Census, because the director had no authority over their appointment, and if the amendment should be adopted you put the whole matter out of the hands of the director into the hands of the Senate, to which body only the supervisors will feel responsible, the very body confirming the Director of the Census and the Secretary of Commerce, and inefficiency is the result. I sincerely trust no man who has a serious purpose and pride in making this census a success will consider voting in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine. Every member of the committee on the Republican side of the Chamber voted in favor of this bill except one, and that was the gentleman from Maine. Every other member on the Republican side of that committee was in favor of reporting this bill exactly as it is. It is not a party question but a business proposition, and I ask that this amendment be voted down.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate close on this amendment in five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HELM. Then I move that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. That, of course, means 10 minutes after the 5 for which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] has been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not been recognized. The Chair saw the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman addressed the Chair, but the Chair saw the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], the chairman of the committee, rise and recognized him.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman from Kentucky extend that? There is no intention of unnecessarily debating that proposition.

Mr. HELM. I disagree with the gentleman about that. I think there is a disposition here to throw all the opposition in the way they possibly can.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will you kindly extend the time 10 minutes?

Mr. HELM. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] has consumed 12 minutes, and it is unreasonable to ask for 30 minutes debate on this section of the bill. Now, I will agree to a reasonable length of time. And I serve notice on you right now that if you are going to resort to that kind of politics I am going to stay here just as long as we can get a quroum to stay here, whereas if you will come to reasonable terms and agreement I am perfectly willing to make that kind of terms.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman if by "that kind of politics" he means our debate?

The CHAIRMAN. This question is not debatable.

Mr. GILLETT. Does he mean method of debate?

Mr. HELM. No; I do not mean the method of debate.

Mr. GILLETT. There has been no attempt to filibuster as yet.

Mr. HELM. I will have to differ with the gentleman on that point.

Mr. GILLETT. There may be, if the gentleman is going to be unreasonable.

Mr. HELM. If the gentlemen will submit a reasonable agreement, I am willing to come to terms with them.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his motion? The question is not debatable.

Mr. GILLETT. Will you allow 10 minutes after the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] has spoken?

Mr. HELM. Reserving 5 minutes to myself; yes—10 minutes on that side and 5 minutes on this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] asks unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be limited to 15 minutes.

Mr. HELM. Ten minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan and five minutes by myself.

Mr. GILLETT. That is, after Mr. ROBBINS has finished his five minutes?

Mr. HELM. No; it is not. We have already consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by making it 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to amend the motion by making the length of time 20 minutes. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr GILLETT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 84.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GILLETT and Mr. HELM took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion by making it 21 minutes.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks it is. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] moves that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky be amended to make it 21 minutes instead of 10.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GILLETT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 86.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chairman appointed Mr. HELM and Mr. GILLETT to act as tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 93.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the pending motion by limiting debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto to one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana moves to amend the pending motion by limiting debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto to one minute. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GILLETT. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 85.

Mr. GILLETT. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. ASWELL and Mr. GILLETT to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by making it 23 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that that motion is dilatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes that after so many motions have been made to change this time it is dilatory. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. The last motion that was made was made by that side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that nobody made a point of order that that was dilatory. If he had, the Chair would have held that it was dilatory.

Mr. GILLETT. If the Chair will allow me, it seems to me clear that the motion was not made for the purpose of occasioning delay. I take it that the purpose of a motion decides whether or not it is dilatory, whether it is really to occasion delay or to accomplish its purpose. The gentleman from Louisiana did not move to make it one minute for the sake of delay.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman state on his honor as a Member of the House that he is not trying to consume time?

Mr. GILLETT. I will state on my honor as a Member of this House that my purpose is to try to secure more time for debate—23 minutes—and I think I ought to have it. [Applause.] I think also, Mr. Chairman, that the Chair would have been inadvertent if he had held the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana to be dilatory. I do not think it was dilatory.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman state why he did not make his motion 23 minutes at the beginning?

Mr. GILLETT. At the beginning I would have been content with 20 minutes, and I think it would have been only reasonable to give me 20 minutes. If the gentleman will allow me 20 minutes now I will take it.

Mr. HELM. I am perfectly willing to come to a fair understanding with the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT. That is all I wish.

Mr. HELM. That is all I wish myself.

Mr. GILLETT. This is the crucial point in the whole bill from our point of view, this question of supervisors. Now, to say that that shall be debated only for 10 minutes, 5 for it and 5 against, is unreasonable.

Mr. HELM. I proposed 10 minutes. You already had 20 minutes. If the gentleman will submit a reasonable request I will agree to it.

Mr. GILLETT. I want five minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] wants five minutes, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] wants five minutes.

Mr. HELM. I will agree to it, and five minutes to this side.

Mr. GILLETT. That is all I ask for.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not recognize the gentleman now, but later. The gentleman will indulge the Chair just a moment. The gentleman from Massachusetts made a point of order that this decision of the Chair was hardly in order, because these were not dilatory motions. The Chair begs to state that there is a decision by a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, Mr. JAMES E. WATSON, of Indiana.

After a second amendment to change the time had been offered by Mr. Fitzgerald the point of order was made by Mr. James A. Tawney that the motion was dilatory, and the chairman held that it was. In this case more than two amendments have been offered to change the time, and under those circumstances the Chair thinks he was justified in holding the motion dilatory. [Applause.] The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. I object.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The original motion was that the debate be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. HELM. I withdraw that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman desires to withdraw that motion. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. I object to the withdrawal of the motion.

Mr. HELM. I move that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 21 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I make a point of order against the motion, under the ruling that the Chair has already made.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky that all debate on this amendment and the paragraph close in 20 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The motion is dilatory, and the substitute is in exactly the same words as the amendment heretofore offered. I insist on the point of order, and I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. The Chair has not forgotten the regular order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] that debate upon this section and all amendments be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. GARNER. I have a substitute motion.

Mr. HELM. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CALDWELL. I object to the withdrawal of the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order.

Mr. GARNER. The Chair is in error if he thinks the motion can not be amended.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move, as an amendment, that debate close in 19 minutes, and I should like to be heard on that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves, as a substitute, that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 19 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I make a point of order against that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GILLETT. What is the point of order? I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not recognize anybody until there is order in the Hall. The Chair can not recognize anyone when half a dozen Members are trying to talk at one time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair holding out of order the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Chair kindly hear me for one minute?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the original motion pending at the present time was to close debate in 10 minutes. An amendment was then offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] to limit the debate to 20 minutes. That was voted down. An amendment was then offered to limit the dedate to 21 minutes. That was voted down. Then an amendment was offered to limit debate to 1 minute; that was also voted down. But, Mr. Chairman, I direct the attention of the Chair to the fact that no vote has been taken except on the proposition that the debate be limited to 1 minute, which has been voted down, and on the amendments that the debate be limited to 20 and 21 minutes, respectively. The sense of the House has not been taken as yet on the question of limiting the debate to 10 minutes or on any intervening time between 10 and 20 minutes, and I respectfully say that the Chair can not hold, in view of the votes that have been taken, that the committee may not decide to have the debate close in 19 minutes, which is a time between 20 minutes and 10 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. What was the result of the vote on the motion to limit the debate to one minute? Was that carried or lost?

The CHAIRMAN. That was lost.

Mr. GARLAND. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee will indulge the Chair a moment, in the decisions of a former chairman he did not wait until four motions had been made, but when two had been made he held that that was dilatory. The Chair felt that under the circumstances offering amendment after amendment he was justified in holding the amendment dilatory. Now, the Chair begs to say that if the gentleman from Kentucky desires to appeal from the decision of the Chair he is within his rights in doing so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not been in the Chamber and know nothing of what has gone before, but it is inconceivable to my mind that a motion to limit debate, which is a motion to expedite, if made in good faith, as it was made by the gentleman from Texas, should be held out of order; and then to hold out of order the motion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, made in good faith, is really preventing the House expediting, instead of preventing a filibuster, and for that reason I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair. If the Chair insists on the ruling, I insist on my appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. One motion had been made to limit debate to 20 minutes and another motion made to limit it to 21 minutes, and after several motions of one kind and another the Chair held that the motion of the gentleman from Texas was dilatory.

Mr. GARNER. Will the Chair indulge me? The Chair held my motion dilatory, and I think for that reason I ought to have one minute to explain the reason for my making the motion. The Chair will remember the colloquy between the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Massachusetts, in which an agreement had been reached by the Member in charge of the bill and the minority leader for 20 minutes' debate. The gentleman from Kentucky made a motion that 20 minutes be allowed on the amendment. The gentleman from New York objected, and the Chair held that he could not withdraw his motion for 10 minutes and substitute one for 20 minutes except by unanimous consent. In order to relieve the situation I offered a motion in perfect good faith, trying to carry out the wishes made by the Member in charge of the bill and the minority leader, and I respectfully insist to the Chair that that could not, in the very nature of things, be considered dilatory, because it was, in a parliamentary way, arriving at a conclusion that the man in charge of the bill and the minority leader were trying to arrive at.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to state that he decided the motion of the gentleman from Texas dilatory from the fact that the motion had been made before and voted down by the committee.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin to make it 19 minutes is agreeable to the committee, and I do not think the chairman under the circumstances should hold it dilatory.

Mr. HELM. The motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is thoroughly agreeable to me.

Mr. CALDWELL. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. The question now is on the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me? Let me appeal to the gentleman from New York. The Chair is evidently convinced that this motion is not for dilatory purposes. In order to be consistent in his ruling he adhered to the proposition that a third motion to limit debate was dilatory, but let me appeal to the gentleman from New York to withdraw his point of order that the vote may come directly on the proposition.

Mr. CALDWELL. In reply to the gentleman from Texas I want to say that if he had been here and seen the filibuster that has been going on he would understand why I insist on my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CALDWELL) there were 42 ayes and 76 noes.

So the decision of the Chair was held not to be the judgment of the committee.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, would it be in order for me to submit a unanimous-consent request?

The CHAIRMAN. It would.

Mr. HELM. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 19 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NICHOLS] and 4 minutes by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 19 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan and 4 minutes by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he will not agree after the disposition of this paragraph or section of the bill to move that the committee rise?

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope the committee will not rise or the House adjourn until we are ready to present the conference report on the sundry civil bill for printing under the rule.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I know that at this late hour a serious consideration of this bill will be a difficult matter. It would be a trying ordeal for me to address you and probably a difficult matter for you to listen. I am going to take a few minutes to point out what I believe to be a serious mistake in this bill. The tenth paragraph contains what I consider to be a radical departure from census legislation heretofore adopted, and to be wrong. This paragraph provides that the "supervisors of the census shall be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census." By referring to the two prior acts under which the two prior censuses have been taken we discovered that this is not in accordance with the provisions of the prior acts at all, but is a radical departure from them. By the act of March 3, 1899, under which the census of 1900 was taken, which has been extolled all through this debate as a correct, accurate, and authoritative census, we find this provision in the ninth section of that bill:

The Director of the Census shall, at least six months prior to the date fixed for the enumeration, designate the number of supervisors of the census to be appointed within each State or Territory, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Turn to the next census bill, which was approved upon the 2d of July, 1909, for the census of 1910, and you will observe that each of these bills was approved the year before the census was taken and not two years before, as here; and we find in the ninth section of that bill a provision that the supervisors "shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. For a question.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman recall that that delay cost $3,000,000?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know that. I have heard it asserted. Here is the point I want to make: That bill was vetoed, as I explained the other day in citing President Roosevelt's veto, because it violated the provisions of the civil-service law, as this one does, by placing its appointees outside of its provisions. Here is the point I wish to impress upon the Members of this House: The men who were appointed as supervisors of the census were men of prominence in their community. They were rated with men who held judicial positions in Pennsylvania. They were regarded and respected with men who were Members of this body in my State; and when a man died it was one of the very honorable things that was said to his great fame and credit by men who spoke about him that he had served as a supervisor of the census of 1900 or 1910. It has been asserted here that the census of 1890 was useless, inaccurate, and worthless; and why? Because the supervisors who were appointed were men who did not properly discharge the duty of the important places they filled and who did not select proper, intelligent, and responsible men as enumerators.

There is a purpose in having these men appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, because the Senate of the United States is composed of two Members from each State, thereby preserving the equality of the States, the large and the small, the populous and the sparsely settled alike. And when the Senate has the right to advise and consent to appointments, when they are made by the President, with that all-searching and overruling power existing as an aid to presidential selection, men of prominence, of responsibility and intelligence, and men who will discharge their duty properly and faithfully, are appointed.

I suspect that there is a reason why this unprecedented and unusual provision is put in this bill and has been omitted in prior bills. I have not heard it adverted to as yet in this debate, but I venture to suggest that this may be a means of padding out the population of some of the less populous districts in the United States. Let me call the attention of the membership of this House to the situation of those who stand sponsors for this bill, honorable men, all of them Members of this House. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] holds his seat in this House as the Representative of 165,822 people. I hold my seat in this House as a Representative of a population of 303,993 people. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], the right-hand assistant to the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill, holds his seat upon the floor of this House because he represents a population of 196,077 people.

The other gentleman, my friend Judge ALEXANDER, of Missouri, holds his seat in this House here as the representative of a population of 159,419. May it not be the purpose to so arrange the supervisors of census and the enumerators as to make it possible to count a few extra people in these sparsely settled districts? This would be a method of keeping up the congressional representation of the South. I do not say it will be done, but this arrangement makes it possible to do this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBBINS. So here we have the ratio of population. I have 303,993 of population back of me, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] has 196,077, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] 165,822, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN], another member of the Census Committee and able assistant of the honorable gentleman, the chairman here, has 208,463 people in his district.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. No. I have only a minute more. Please excuse me. Is it not the plan, and may it not be the purpose—I do not know that it is; but it is one of the possible things and may happen if these supervisors of the census are appointed for political purposes, as has been asserted over and over in this debate they will be—to have them appoint enumerators who will be like the enumerators in 1890, of whom it is said that they counted population where it did not exist in order to make local communities more populous and more important than they actually were.

Of course, this swelling of population by fictitiously and fraudulently adding to the true number of actual people in a district a large number of names of people whose names were found only on gravestones or in the imagination of the enumerators gave undue prominence to communities, additional judges to counties, and undeserved congressional representation to States. We should keep this bill, like Cæsar's wife, "above the breath of suspicion."

There is another reason why all political policies and favoritism should be abolished from this act of Congress, that should have compelling influence with the Democratic majority in this House and on this committee. This bill was reported out of committee May 21 last, and six days later, May 27, the President appeared before Congress and delivered his address on "the finances." In this clarion call to duty he said in part: "Politics is adjourned. The elections will go to those who think least of it; to those who go to their constituencies without explanations or excuses, with a plain record of duty faithfully and disinterestedly performed." How can the majority fail to heed this Executive admonition? This bill was framed along extreme party lines before the President spoke; it is now the clear duty of the majority to eliminate partisanship from its 29 pages of provisions and diversions. Should the majority refuse to follow the President's declaration so emphatically and forcibly made, then the mask is off, and this ought to be styled a bill to keep the Democratic Party in office. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that I have anything to say that is at all commensurate with the trouble and the delay we have had in getting time for it. I certainly would not have had this little fracas in the House for the purpose of getting my five minutes, but it has come up as it generally does by both sides getting a little irritated at what they thought was unreasonable in the other, and I want to confess that in the main I consider the gentleman who has had charge of this bill has been reasonable and considerate and I think we can say that also of ourselves on this side. The gentleman thought we had been a little unreasonable, but if he will reflect he will recognize that we might in the few days this has been up have made points of no quorum time after time, but we refrained, and this is about the first time there has been any exciting political antagonism. Of course, those are times when we are apt to irritate each other and each side is apt to think the other is unreasonable. I want to suggest to the gentleman that until just now we have not filibustered, and have not attempted to take advantage of our opportunities of opposition.

The one point in this bill which I think deserves most censure is this appointment of the supervisors by the Director of the Census instead of providing, as it has always been in the past, appointment by the President, confirmation by the Senate, and the increase of the supervisors from 330 to 400. I charge that that is done with a distinct political purpose, that the purpose is to acquire more patronage for that side of the House, and to acquire it of a character less responsible and more partisan than if the men were appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I have only five minutes, but I yield.

Mr. HELM. Suppose the next House be Republican?

Mr. GILLETT. The next House does not have anything to do with it. They are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate and not by the House. No matter what the complexion of the Senate is, whether Republican or Democrat, yet when the President is to appoint supervisors publicly, in the light of day, where the appointment goes to the Senate and then is scrutinized and confirmed by the Senate, you get, I believe, a far higher class of men than when they are simply appointed in the dark by the Director of the Census.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman will give me a little of his four minutes; otherwise I can not.

Mr. ASWELL. Just for a question.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman knows I have not the time.

Mr. ASWELL. It is very short.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know this Director of the Census personally, but I did know the former Director of the Census, Mr. Harris, who was first appointed by President Wilson. I know that he was a politician, and I thought he was probably a much better politician than a Director of the Census. He was the chairman, I believe, of the Democratic Party in Georgia——

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I have not the time to yield. The present Director of the Census was, I understand, the campaign manager of Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina, and it is to that man that we are yielding the appointment of these 400 supervisors. Now, the President says that politics should be adjourned for the war. We have tried, I think both sides have tried, to keep politics out of this session, and this, to my recollection, is the first time it has been injected, and this, in my opinion, is an unequivocal barefaced attempt to secure patronage and Democratic workers for the next presidential election. The alleged excuse for giving the appointments to the director, that it would be inconvenient for them to be confirmed by the Senate, seems to be specious, because there is not one chance in a hundred that the Senate will not be in session next summer, and there will be plenty of opportunity to confirm these appointments if they are to be named by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Therefore, the appointment by the director is, it seems to me, clearly a political aim, by which shortly before a presidential campaign that side of the House hopes to get 400 political emissaries, scattered over the country, to work for Democratic success.

Now, we have given and are giving lavishly and unstintedly, and this side of the House has united in it, both of money and patronage to the administration which is now in power, and we think now an enormous political machine is being constructed, and when I consider what you will have organized under Democratic leadership for the next election, then it seems to me it is almost superfluous and frightfully grasping for you to add these 400 supervisors to your well-paid army. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Michigan consumed all his time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has four minutes remaining.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the only excuse offered by the committee for transferring the appointment of these supervisors from the President, which has been the order for many past decennial censuses, to the Secretary of Commerce, is that the Senate will not be in session to confirm the appointments that the President might make. And yet, that is a sham excuse, in face of the fact, as everyone here knows, that with the war on this Congress must continue in session and be in session with no longer lapses than two months at a time. President Taft took pride in the character of the men that he selected. For the head of the Census Bureau he selected Mr. E. Dana Durand, an eminent statistician who, after his retirement by the incoming administration, accepted a position of professor of statistics in the University of Minnesota, I believe.

But Mr. Taft was also very considerate of the caliber of the supervisors who were to take this census throughout the country. He appointed the highest character of men. And if, as has been stated by the representatives of the committee, this is to be a census as far as agriculture is concerned and as far as manufactures is concerned—and if anyone will read the preceding section they will see that is the fact—to be of value only to statisticians and political economists, then, if it is going to be of any value at all, it should be taken by expert men and not by political ward heelers. We should have expert men. I would rather go further, and have these men qualify by civil-service examination. There are men throughout the country who are statisticians and who are beyond the draft age. In the Department of Labor there are women qualifying as statisticians, and if we are going to have a thorough investigation upon which statisticians and political economists can rely, one that will be the basis for statistical comparisons, then those supervisors should be appointed by the President, at least, and if I had my way, after civil-service examination. We all know that the present amiable Director of the Census, whom I have had occasion to meet several times, will see to it that not only the 330 supervisors that were provided for in the last census act, but the 70 additional supervisors that are provided for in this section will be of the kind of the "true and faithful."

We need not expect that the amiable but astute Director of the Census will not consider the request of any Democratic Representative for not only one supervisor in his district but the many supervisors that will be provided in addition to those that have heretofore been authorized—330 in the last census and in this bill 400 provided—and yet with the large proportionate increase of population being in the cities, where there will be but one supervisor, it is now proposed to divide up the congressional districts and——

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not.

As I said, it is now proposed to divide up the congressional districts and to give more patronage than was provided in the last census act, and in the act before that, to the Director of the Census. We know the recommendations of the Director of the Census will naturally go through without any further ado. It is a mere question of political appointment under the change as recommended by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this matter has a purely business feature and phase to it and nothing else. The method of appointing these supervisors was recommended by men who have been connected with the Census Bureau for 20-odd years, and the majority of them are Republicans and not Democrats. The second one of the main reasons why these men should be appointed by the director instead of by the Senate is that these men must be appointed in July, 1919, and you can not afford to take a chance on the fact that the Senate will then be in session. It is not a business way to proceed. Now, as to the argument here that this is a political scheme: If the President has appointed such men as Mr. Rogers, the Director of the Census, and Mr. Redfield, the Secretary of Commerce, and if they are such extreme, ultra-partisan men, as has been stated by those proposing the amendment, is it not reasonable to suppose that the supervisors who should be appointed by the President, by the same token, would be just as extreme, just as radical, just as ultra-partisans, as the Secretary of Commerce or the Director of the Census himself?

You have simply worked yourself into a frenzy about a matter that really ought not to have attracted any attention.

The supervisors ought to be appointed, so that the work can proceed in a united, solid, businesslike way. They would get into all sorts of squabbles over there in the Senate about who should be appointed supervisors. One Senator would want one man and another Senator would want another. Members of Congress would perhaps get over and confuse things by offering their suggestions.

You are surely going to delay a tremendous amount of work just by the amount of delay that results in the appointment and confirmation by the Senate of one of these supervisors. If any one of them is not appointed, if 10 days or 2 weeks or 60 days are consumed in a squabble in the Senate over the appointment of supervisors, then the work of completing the final result of the whole census is delayed 60 days, 30 days, or 6 months, according to the time consumed in appointing a supervisor in the Senate instead of appointing him in a businesslike way by the Director of the Census.

And I want you gentlemen to understand that this bill was reported out of the committee with almost a unanimous report. There is only one man on the committee drafting the bill who opposed the bill in any way. If this was a bill of such partisan type do you think that men who are representative Republicans on the Census Committee would have agreed that this bill should be reported out in the form that it is? They heard the testimony before the committee; they saw the men; they heard the arguments; and they understood the merit of the proposition, and every Republican on that committee voted for this bill before you injected this little piece of partisanship in it. As a cool business proposition it appealed to everybody on the Census Committee except the gentleman from Maine. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FLOOD). The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HERSEY: Page 10, line 11, after the second "the," strike out the words "Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," so that the same shall read "the supervisors shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GILLETT. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Ohio: Page 10, line 13, after the word "Census" insert "and the Member of Congress representing the district in which said official will supervise the taking of such census," so that it will read, "the supervisors shall be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census and the Member of Congress representing the district in which said official will supervise the taking of such census."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that amendment will not pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed.

Mr. GARNER. Debate has been closed on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment pending at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 10, line 14, strike out the words "four hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "three hundred and thirty, not over one-half of whom shall be of the same political party."

Mr. MADDEN. I hope they will not do away with the four hundred. Those social "four hundred" should be retained. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That each supervisor of census shall be charged with the performance within his own district of the following duties: To consult with the Director of Census in regard to the division of his district into subdivisions most convenient for the purpose of the enumeration, which subdivisions or enumeration districts shall be defined and the boundaries thereof fixed by the Director of the Census; to designate to the director suitable persons and with his consent to employ such persons as enumerators, one or more for each subdivision; to communicate to enumerators the necessary instructions and directions relating to their duties; to examine and scrutinize the returns of the enumerators, and in the event of discrepancies or deficiencies appearing in any of the said returns, to use all diligence in causing the same to be corrected or supplied; to forward the completed returns of the enumerators to the director at such time and in such manner as shall be prescribed, and to make up and forward to the director the accounts of each enumerator in his district for service rendered, which accounts shall be duly certified to by the enumerator, and the same shall be certified as true and correct if so found by the supervisor, and said accounts so certified shall be accepted and paid by the director. The duties imposed upon the supervisor by this act shall be performed in any and all particulars in accordance with the orders and instructions of the Director of the Census.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Is this provision the same as it was in the law in prior years? I make the inquiry particularly as to whether supervisors in times past have been authorized to pass upon the accounts of the enumerators, as provided in this section?

Mr. HELM. Section 10 is a reenactment of the old law word for word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then authority heretofore has been vested in the supervisors to pass upon the accounts of the enumerators as provided here?

Mr. HELM. I do not think there is a particle of change in that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was wondering whether it was new or whether it was the old law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is the language of the existing law.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That each supervisor of the census shall, upon the completion of his duties to the satisfaction of the Director of the Census, receive the sum of $1,500, and in addition thereto $1 for each thousand or major fraction of a thousand of population enumerated in his district, such sums to be in full compensation for all services rendered and expenses incurred by him: Provided, That of the above-named compensation a sum not to exceed $600, in the discretion of the Director of the Census, may be paid to any supervisor prior to the completion of his duties in one or more payments, as the Director of the Census may determine: Provided further, That in emergencies arising in connection with the work of preparation for or during the progress of the enumeration in his district, or in connection with the reenumeration of any subdivision, a supervisor may, in the discretion of the Director of the Census, be allowed actual and necessary traveling expenses and an allowance in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 per day during his necessary absence from his usual place of residence: And provided further, That an appropriate allowance to supervisors for clerk hire may be made when deemed necessary by the Director of the Census.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, on page 12, line 3, I move to strike out the figures "$1,500" and the words "and in addition thereto $1 for each thousand or major fraction of a thousand of population enumerated in his district," and insert in place thereof the figures "$1,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 12, lines 3 to 5, strike out the words "$1,500, and in addition thereto $1 for each thousand or major fraction of a thousand of population enumerated in his district," and insert in lieu thereof "$1,800," so that the sentence will read:

"That each supervisor of the census shall, upon completion of his duties to the satisfaction of the Director of the Census, receive the sum of $1,800."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I take it that I do not need to assure the chairman of the committee, or any of the members of it, that I am offering this amendment in perfect good faith. There is no attempt to hinder or delay the consideration of the section or the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The compensation provided in the bill is the same as the compensation provided in the act for the Thirteenth Decennial Census, and we think that the compensation now should not be less than it was then.

Mr. WALSH. I assume that it is the same compensation provided by law for the last census, but I do not think it is the proper way to pay these officials. By this provision you encourage overlooking errors on the plus side of the ledger. If these men are worthy of being appointed to conduct these enumerations, they ought to be paid a substantial salary. We ought not to make their pay dependent upon the number of names which they report.

Let us give them a flat salary, ample to get the proper sort of men to do this work. Do not let us say to them: "We will pay you $1,500, and then for every thousand that you enumerate in your district you get $1 per thousand extra." I submit that is not the proper way to employ temporary officials for important work, such as is reposed in these men for enumerating the population.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman think we can get competent men to act as supervisors of the census in any of our great cities for $1,800?

Mr. WALSH. If that is not sufficient, let us make it larger. I think the salary of $1,500 and $1 per thousand——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Has there not been heretofore some suggestion that when the reward for labor depends upon the number of names enumerated there is an incentive to men to fake lists of names supposed to have been enumerated?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly. There is always that temptation, but it may not be on the part of the supervisor.

Mr. ASWELL. The enumerator makes an affidavit.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, certainly the enumerator makes an affidavit, but, as I say, the supervisor will be lax in correcting errors where lists may have been padded. The supervisor might not have knowledge of that. It is going to encourage the temptation to return larger lists than ordinarily would be returned if they got a flat salary. Whether $1,800 is a sufficient sum or not, the Director of the Census is permitted in this section to give a bonus of $600.

Mr. HELM. I am satisfied that the gentleman from Massachusetts is endeavoring in good faith to hold down the compensation of the supervisors, but does he realize that he only gets $1 for each thousand persons enumerated, and the idea of padding the lists by a thousand is unthinkable to me. I can see how in stuffing a ballot box you might put in a few, but when you stuff in a thousand it is not at all probable.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But in certain districts in the United States, where a man does not know his neighbor on his right or his left, he can sit down and manufacture them by the thousand without detection.

Mr. HELM. The enumerators that take those lists?

Mr. WALSH. It might not amount to an enormous sum, but if it only amounted to $1 we ought not to encourage it, and we ought not to write a provision in the law that would admit of it.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Does the gentleman think it would be profitable for anybody to write a thousand names on these lists for $1?

Mr. WALSH. He would not have to write a thousand names for $1.

Mr. HELM. He not only has to write them, but he has to put in the nationality and all that sort of thing.

Mr. ROBBINS. May I ask a question?

Mr. HELM. I have not the floor.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then I move to strike out the last word. As this figures out, I may be in error, if so I want to be corrected, the compensation would be a flat $1,500 salary, and then in my district there are 400,000 people, and he would get $4,000, at the rate of $1 a thousand.

Mr. HELM. Oh, no; he would only get $1 a thousand, and that would be $400.

Mr. ROBBINS. That would permit him to receive $1,900.

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman will yield, in the State of Massachusetts there was only one supervisor for the whole State, and there are 4,000,000 people in the State. That would give the supervisor a salary of $1,500 and $4,000 besides. Does the gentleman think that is excessive?

Mr. HELM. The gentleman says that they had one supervisor for the entire State?

Mr. GILLETT. I think so.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman knows that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts takes its own census every five years, and the Federal Government took this census in cooperation with the State, and it only needed one supervisor.

Mr. GILLETT. But under this bill the supervisor would get $4,000 additional.

Mr. ASWELL. And have less to do.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman think that is right?

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts think that every district in the United States should be penalized because the State of Massachusetts is in a class by itself?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know that it is in a class by itself, there may be other States in the same class. The bill ought to provide equitably for every district, and it seems to me that some deserving Democrat up in the State of Massachusetts would get a pretty fat job, which I do not approve of.

Mr. HELM. I do not think there is very much fat in a job of this kind.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Did the gentleman ever find any difficulty in getting candidates for it?

Mr. HELM. I never had an opportunity to find out; I have never been asked.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 38, noes 65.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 21, after the word "census," insert "And provided further, That no supervisor of the census shall receive a total compensation in excess of $2,500 per annum."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this provision, it gives the supervisor a flat salary of $1,500 and in addition to that $1 for each thousand enumerated. The amendment I have offered I think cures the defect and provides a payment which will permit him a liberal salary.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman think he can get a competent man for supervisor in one of these large cities for $2,500? In the past we have only appointed one supervisor for one city. I think the law is the only equitable rule. This has been the law for the twelfth and thirteenth censuses. The compensation then was the same as provided in this bill. We have not changed existing law one particle.

Mr. GOOD. But there has been a weakness in the existing law. Everyone has recognized that. Enumerators in some places have even visited cemeteries. They have padded returns, and this law simply encourages that sort of thing.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman think they do that in order that the supervisor may get more pay?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know why they do it. The gentleman knows that it has been done.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; and we have amended the existing law in an effort to prevent that and to punish the guilty parties.

Mr. GOOD. This would give them $900 in addition to their flat salary, and it does not seem to me that it ought to be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question. There is a provision in section 11 which allows for an emergency—that in emergencies arising in connection with the work of preparation for or during the progress of the enumeration in his district, or in connection with the reenumeration of any subdivision, a supervisor may, in the discretion of the Director of the Census, be allowed actual and necessary traveling expenses and an allowance in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 per day during his necessary absence from his usual place of residence.

What is in contemplation with regard to the emergency that might arise? I can see how there might be great abuse of a provision of that kind.

Mr. HELM. A stated case might arise where a supervisor is appointed who is not skilled in tabulation. He gets his work "balled up," to use a slang expression, and the director has to send a department official to straighten out the work of the supervisor.

Mr. GOOD. What I had in mind was this: Is the language unusual?

Mr. HELM. It is in the existing law. There is no change from the existing law.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That each enumerator shall be charged with the collection in his subdivision of the facts and statistics required by the population and agricultural schedules and such other schedules as the Director of the Census may determine shall be used by him in connection with the census, as provided in section 8 of this act. It shall be the duty of each enumerator to visit personally each dwelling house in his subdivision, and each family therein, and each individual living out of a family in any place of abode, and by inquiry made of the head of each family, or of the member thereof deemed most competent and trustworthy, or of such individual living out of a family, to obtain each and every item of information and all particulars required by this act, as of date January 1 of the year in which the enumeration shall be made; and in case no person shall be found at the usual place of abode of such family, or individual living out of a family, competent to answer the inquiries made in compliance with the requirements of this act, then it shall be lawful for the enumerator to obtain the required information as nearly as may be practicable from the family or families or person or persons living nearest to such place of abode who may be competent to answer such inquiries. It shall be the duty also of each enumerator to forward the original schedules, properly filled out and duly certified, to the supervisor of his district as his returns under the provision of this act; and in the event of discrepancies or deficiencies being discovered in these schedules he shall use all diligence in correcting or supplying the same. In case an enumeration district embraces all or any part of any incorporated borough, village, town, or city, and also other territory not included within the limits of such incorporated borough, village, town, or city, it shall be the duty of the enumerator to clearly and plainly distinguish and separate, upon the population schedules, the inhabitants of such borough, village, town, or city from the inhabitants of the territory not included therein. No enumerator shall be deemed qualified to enter upon his duties until he has received from the supervisor of the district to which he belongs a commission, signed by the supervisor, authorizing him to perform the duties of enumerator, and setting forth the boundaries of the subdivision within which such duties are to be performed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman state whether the date when this work begins is the same in this section as in the existing law? As I recall, the work usually has begun some time in April, about the middle of the month.

Mr. HELM. That is the fact.

Mr. WALSH. What is the reason for changing it and advancing it so far back into what is practically midwinter?

Mr. HELM. There was some difference of opinion expressed before the committee among those who appeared and who were questioned on this change in the existing law. The committee that prepared the bill, and men of long experience in former censuses, in the preparation of the law, the doing of the work, the operation of it from every phase and angle, men who ought to know what they are talking about, suggested the change, and for that reason, on the recommendation of these men, the change was made from April to January.

Mr. WALSH. Were any of these men, men who had been previously employed in gathering these statistics, supervisors in the various districts throughout the country?

Mr. HELM. I do not know that they had actually been employed as the supervisors of districts, but they had been associated with the Census Bureau for quite a number of years.

Mr. WALSH. I can well understand how gentlemen sitting down here in Washington might want to change the time back to the 1st of January, and would give no consideration to the weather or climatic conditions of the country when they were deciding when the work should start. It would seem to me that inasmuch as for years past, in the past four censuses at least, we started this work in the month of April, the time of the year when the weather is getting more favorable for people to move about the country, when it is easier to find people, that it would be unwise to move it back into midwinter, when we might have, as we did have last year, most strenuous and severe cold weather, and with suffering and interference with transportation, shutdown of industries, and all the attending evils that come from cold weather and shortage of fuel.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will yield to the gentleman's colleague.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The bill provides that if on account of weather conditions and other abnormal conditions it is not practical to take a census in any district on the 1st of January it may be taken at a different date. This affects an agricultural census more than a census of mining, of manufactures, and hence it was the disposition to think that April was a better time; and we called before the committee the Secretary of Agriculture, and he was of opinion that the 1st of January would be the desirable time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment by striking out "January 1" and inserting "April 15."

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. ASWELL. I will say to the gentleman I went personally very carefully into that very question, and the evidence gathered from those who were experienced in this work convinced me against my first judgment that January is the best time for several reasons. The first reason is that it is the end of the year, that business is more easily gotten together, and the fact that the multiplication of live stock is not as rapid. In April is the breeding time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for five minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT. I ask the gentleman if he does not think we had better rise.

Mr. HELM. If we can dispose of this section——

Mr. GILLETT. All right.

Mr. ASWELL. Further, it is easier to find people, college men, college boys, people who can get away from their work for a few weeks at that period better than at any other time. Then, again, the people are at home. A larger per cent are at home on January 1 than at any other period of the year.

Mr. WALSH. On account of the Christmas holidays?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes, sir. Besides, that is the most economical time of the year. I agreed with the gentleman at first, and I was convinced against my first judgment that January 1 is the proper time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment to change this from January 1 to April 15. I want to withdraw that amendment, because I am greatly impressed with the statement made by the gentleman from Louisiana and the argument which he has presented.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman withdrawing the amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is this the section under which soldiers are to be enumerated?

Mr. HELM. There is no special provision for enumerating soldiers.

Mr. ROBBINS. How are they to be counted? That is what I want to know.

Mr. HELM. Well, I do not know I can give the gentleman from Pennsylvania a specific answer as to just how it will be done; but the men are enlisted and whether they are alive or dead at the time remains to be seen.

Mr. ROBBINS. I see the difficulty——

Mr. HELM. The war records will be available to ascertain the names, residences, age, color, and so forth, of the soldier.

Mr. ROBBINS. I see on page 13, line 5, it provides that the head of the family shall give information; but how would the head of the family know when our soldiers are serving in France with so little information available?

Mr. HELM. You can not tell whether they are dead or alive, or provide any way for ascertaining it.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is what I wanted to ascertain whether there is any special provision for that purpose or whether it was under this provision.

Mr. HELM. You could not write a law so as to ascertain it.

Mr. SIEGEL. If the gentleman will permit, the head of each family at home will give the names of the persons of that particular family, including the soldier or sailor. Those names will be given to the enumerator, and we thus will get the total number of people in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13.——

Mr. HELM (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. I understand section 12 is closed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONFERENCE REPORT—SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHERLEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, presented the conference report on the bill H. R. 12441, making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, for printing under the rules.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question of profiteering. I happen to be a member of that committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are these the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. CROSSER. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise by remarks on this census bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the census bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the situation regarding the war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the general situation regarding the war. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, are these the gentleman's own remarks or a speech by somebody else?

Mr. CLAYPOOL. They are my own, absolutely.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4274. An act providing for the establishment of the port of San Juan, customs district of Porto Rico, as a port of entry for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 86. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point Aurelio Collazo, a citizen of Cuba.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 29, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Black River at Lorain, Ohio (H. Doc. No. 1200); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustration.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the United States Employees' Compensation Commission submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation required by the commission for salaries and expenses for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1201); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting deficiency of appropriation required by the Navy Department for fiscal year 1918 and prior years (H. Doc. No. 1202); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Public Printer submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation for salaries, office of superintendent of documents, for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1203); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SIMS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 715), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MONTAGUE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4597) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 721), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1431) to correct the military record of George F. Reid, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 714), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9673) for the relief of Nathan B. Wilber, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 716), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LITTLE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6486) for the relief of Marion B. Patterson, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 718), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1189) for the relief of Lavern Walker, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 722), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

My Mr. MASON: A bill (H. R. 12587) providing for increased pension for Civil War veterans whose wives are living; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EAGAN: A bill (H. R. 12588) to provide for the construction of a tunnel under the Hudson River between the States of New York and New Jersey; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. GANDY: A bill (H. R. 12589) to amend section 4 of the act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. DENTON: A bill (H. R. 12590) to incorporate the War Mothers of America; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. FLOOD: A bill (H. R. 12591) to authorize the payment of losses sustained by a French citizen in connection with the search for the body of Admiral John Paul Jones; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. RANDALL: A bill (H. R. 12596) to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors during the present war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.
